I have a stronger case than this—this great Union Bank itself became a cotton-broker, and advanced fifteen cents per pound to the planters for their cotton, and shipped it to Baring & Brothers, who advanced to the bank about half that sum; yet the cotton sold for less than the amount advanced to the bank by the Barings, and the balance is unpaid, the bank insolvent, and has assigned its assets without providing for this debt; yet no one complains of dishonesty or dishonor in this transaction, while the same Barings have advanced the Bank of the United States money on hypothecated, pretended Mississippi bonds; and, according to the gentleman's code of honesty and morality, the State is dishonored because she will not assume the payment of these bonds, for which she received nothing—no more than she did of the advances upon the cotton shipped by the Union Bank. The Government of Great Britain has repudiated forged exchequer bills that had passed into the hands of innocent holders; has repudiated a portion of her national debt, by taxing the income of the holders of her bonds; yet she is not branded with dishonor by our moralists here. Wagon-loads of continental money, issued during the revolutionary war, the use of which enabled our forefathers to achieve their independence; countless obligations of the States, issued for value received during the same period, have been repudiated without a stain upon the national escutcheon; yet, because Mississippi refuses to recognise an unconstitutional debt, for which she has received nothing, she is to be accused of tarnishing that escutcheon. Nations all over the civilized world have repudiated bona fide debts, without the charge of dishonor; while we are to be singled out as being disgraced because we will not pay a debt not our own, in contracting which we did not receive value to the amount of a red cent.

I look upon this pretended horror of Mississippi repudiation as hypocritical as it is insulting. The fund-mongers and advocates of the banking, bonding, and paper-money systems in this country and Europe, and their agents here, are bellowing against repudiation, to draw public attention from their own infamous schemes of swindling. We have been taunted by these men who live on the labor of others, through the machinery of the banking and paper money system, until the Robespierre of the Harrison administration, [Mr. GRANGER,] who was as fond of cutting off heads politically as that monster was in reality, has ventured to lecture my colleague for proposing to bring down the expenses of the Government to its current revenue. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. GRANGER,] in his peculiar manner, which he always assumes when he purposes to say something witty or severe, reminded my colleague that it was unnecessary for him to advocate retrenchment, as our debts could be repudiated under the new doctrine, if they became troublesome. He thought he had touched my colleague on a tender point; but, like the blind rattlesnake in August, he struck his fangs into his own politically corrupt body. No man in this House is a more zealous advocate of the repudiation of honest, bona fide debts, under the bankrupt law, than he is. We all recollect his valedictory, when this House was about repealing that law. Yet he has the audacity, in the face of the House, to sneer at repudiation. It was like the devil reproving sin, or a prostitute lecturing on virtue and morality. I will submit to this mode of attack upon my State no longer. If gentlemen will travel out of the regular order of debate to attack us, they must expect to be met with a spirit becoming the Representatives of a people whom neither the scoffs of the corrupt, nor the frowns of power, can turn from their purpose, in defending their constitution and laws from violation.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] points to the fate of China, and warns us to avoid a similar one, by getting into a war with Great Britain. I recollect he, in a public address, put England in the right and China in the wrong in that war, as he intends to do this country, if we have war because we will not assume the State debts. He appears to be on the British side in argument, if he is not in feeling. I do not desire war with Great Britain, or any other nation; but the dread of it shall not force me to advocate the assumption of State debts, in violation of the Constitution of my country. My constituents prefer war, if the other alternative is assumption. We have a deeper interest in peace and commercial intercourse with Great Britain than any State in the Union, as we export more to that country than any other State; yet we will forego all of these advantages of peace, rather than sanction an invasion of our fundamental law. I despise the truckling spirit that is manifesting itself in this country to the power of Great Britain. We can expect no permanent peace by acting thus. I would prefer, in the language of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] to slap John Bull in the face, to quailing before his power. We will gain his respect, and a more permanent peace, by this course.

The gentleman from Massachusetts has great fears of the English Paixhan guns, and supposes many cases to bring them to the bombardment of Natchez. I will answer him by supposing that subjects of Great Britain call on their Government to defend them against the operations of the ex post facto bankrupt law, which has defrauded them out of immense amounts of their debts in this country—bona fide debts—for which full value had been received before the passage of the law. That Government, through its minister here, asks for redress. Our President and Secretary of State return no answer. The potent argument of the Paixhan gun is brought to bear with a fleet of war steamers upon the city of Boston, demanding the British debts repudiated there under the operation of the bankrupt law. What is to be done? Why, according to the reasoning of the gentleman from Massachusetts, the horrors of war must be avoided, and this Government must assume these debts and get clear of the Paixhan guns. I have no such fears of war or Paixhan guns, as to induce me to sanction a violation of the Constitution, to avoid the one or get clear of the other. On the subject of assumption, I may have something to say hereafter. My only object in addressing the House now, has been to defend my State from the unjust imputations that have been cast upon it.

In reply, Mr. GRANGER of New York said that he had been charged on this floor with having unjustly stated that the State of Mississippi, having received five millions of dollars for stock in the Union Bank of Mississippi, had become a stockholder in that institution, and then repudiated, or attempted to repudiate, that debt. What he had stated was this, and he was ready to prove it; the documents were before him. He had stated, or intended to state, that under the laws of Mississippi the Governor of the State had been authorized to sign $15,500,000 of bonds for the Union Bank; that he had been authorized to subscribe $5 000,000 stock for the Union Bank; that he had so subscribed, and had signed this $5,000,000 of bonds; that this $5,000,000 of bonds sold for $5,080,000; that the money was put into the Union Bank, and became its capital.

Mr. GWIN (Mr. GRANGER yielding the floor) said that the Union Bank of Mississippi had issued post-notes, which, from the date of their issuance, had been below par, and had sold her checks on the Bank of the United States, receivable in this irredeemable depreciated money. That was the way the bonds had been sold for par. They had been sold under par, (if gold and silver constituted the standard,) and on credit, which was a violation of the unconstitutional supplement under which the bonds were issued.

Mr. GRANGER would explain this matter. He had not assailed the conduct of the Chief Magistrate of this State, or intended any personal disrespect to him; but he had not made the assertions he had made without the proof before him.

What was the condition of the charter of the Union Bank? It had been created in January, 1838. This supplemental act, which had been declared contrary to good faith, but which was signed by Governor McNutt, had been passed on the 5th of February of the same year. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. GWIN] had told them the other day that these laws had been passed by an undivided Whig vote, with the votes of a few of the "Democrats." Mr. GRANGER understood that there was no exception taken to the original charter, but to the supplemental act. Who voted for the supplemental act? asked Mr. G. They would find, by reference to the records, that it passed by a vote of fourteen Whigs and thirty-six "Democrats." He knew not how many Whigs or how many "Democrats" there were in the Legislature of Mississippi; but he did know that, of the fifty votes that passed the supplemental act, against a minority of something like thirty, fourteen only were Whigs, and thirty-six were "Democrats." Let the question, then, be settled as to who passed this "infamous" supplemental law.

What was next? Governor McNutt, on the spot, and well knowing every fact of the case, signed the law. What next? Governor McNutt, under that "infamous" law, signed the $5,000,000 of bonds. The money was received, and the avails of this $5,000,000 of bonds went into the Union Bank of Mississippi, and constituted its only capital. And how did they treat that institution? He would tell them how. They recognised it as a bank; the State transacted business with it as a bank; they declared by law that the dividends received on that $5,000,000 of stock should go to the cause of internal improvements and of public education. On the 15th of February, 1839, the State of Mississippi borrowed $75,000 of that bank; on the 19th of February it borrowed $75,000 more, and subsequently $25,000 more to finish her public buildings. And before all these transactions, and after signing these bonds, and after the bonds had gone into operation, the State of Mississippi, which had sold city lots in Jackson, and taken promissory notes for them to the amount of $25,106, went to the Union Bank of Mississippi, and had them discounted as a commercial transaction, and put the money into her treasury. Was he to be told, in the face of all these facts, that the State of Mississippi had had nothing to do with that bank?

The gentleman had said that the bondholders could be paid from the assets of the bank. Let them see what those assets were, as presented by the gentleman's own witness and friend, Governor McNutt. He held the statement in his hand. Let them see whether he had ever declared what he could not substantiate—that the $5,000,000 put into the bank from these bonds was the only capital the bank had ever had.

As late as January, 1840, Governor McNutt, in his regular message, says "the faith of the State is pledged for the whole capital stock" of this bank; and the statement of the bank's affairs, as given by this same Governor, in his message of January, 1841, is as follows:

Suspended debt in suit .	$2,689,860 90
Do not in suit .	1,777,337 78
Resources, chiefly unavailable,	8,034,154 98
Immediate liabilities . .	3,034,154 98
Capital stock . .	5,080,000 00
Specie on hand . .	4,349 06

What a beautiful condition for bondholders! said Mr. G.

Mr. GWIN (Mr. GRANGER yielding the floor) said there were ten and a half millions of real estate mortgaged, to which he had alluded when he had said that the assets would probably pay the debt, if the property mortgaged was liable.

Mr. GRANGER. He would come to that. The gentleman had said, in reply to his question, there were $10,500,000 more. Now let them see what these $10,500,000 were; for this was to become a very interesting question in the history of this nation.

There were $10,500,000 more to be secured on bonds and mortgages, as the gentleman said; and he knew it was still an open question whether it should be paid. The gentleman would certainly agree with him, that not one dollar had ever been paid. Governor McNutt, before the Legislature of Mississippi, when urged by Mr. Turner to grant and issue these bonds, had entered his protest against them, and said he had to receive the odium of standing between the voice of the people of Mississippi and his view of constitutional right, but he would not issue these bonds.

[Mr. GRANGER read from a letter of Judge Turner, dated Natchez, March 23, 1838, in which Mr. Gwin's name was introduced in such a manner as to convey the idea that he was in favor of the issuing of these bonds.]

Mr. GWIN (Mr. GRANGER yielding the floor) said that letter was written by Judge Turner, one of the judges of the supreme court of Mississippi; and he had to state that the first time he ever saw or heard of that letter was in print; and he had received a letter from Judge Turner, asking him if he recollected any such letter, or the conversation alluded to; and he had replied that he neither recollected the letter, nor any conversation alluded to on the subject.

Mr. GRANGER continued. He assured the gentleman (and they were not words of ceremony) that he had not introduced the letter with any view to call up an unpleasant thought in the gentleman's mind; he had brought it in, to present the facts of the case, to show that the Union Bank never received but $5,000,000 as its capital, and that this was from the sale of these bonds that had been repudiated; and that Governor McNutt had been urged to issue further bonds, and would not do it; and that thence it was that the capital of the bank had been limited to $5,000,000.

Mr. GWIN said that letter was written before the bonds were issued.

Mr. GRANGER said he still believed that Governor McNutt, in his answers before the committee, had said that he prevented the further issue of these bonds.

Mr. G had not entered on this question with any view to wound the feelings of any man here or elsewhere, or to assail any State of this Union. Had Mississippi, finding herself in the position in which States were and individuals were—had she, from the pressure of the times, been forced to yield, and, declaring this debt her own, asked for further time for its payment, then it would not have had, on this nation, the effect which it was now calculated to have abroad. He had examined this question somewhat, and he had believed, and did now believe, that it was due to the character of the nation that it should be understood. All he had declared was, that the State of Mississippi, through her constituted authorities, had chartered the Union Bank; that fifteen days after it had passed a supplemental act, (signed by Governor McNutt;) that, under that act, $5,080,000 had been received in such currency as they had chosen to receive it in, and that that was the only capital stock the bank had ever received. He had then gone on to declare that this bank—thus raised in corruption, as the gentleman had told them, and in violation of the constitution and laws of Mississippi—had been recognised by the Legislature of that State, which had become a borrower of that institution. He had then declared that Governor McNutt, in his message as late as 1840, had said that, in this matter, he had yielded his individual opinions to the voice of the State, but that he had not then pretended to say that these bonds had been unfairly negotiated; or, if he had, these extracts from his message had been unfairly quoted; and he would like to hear the gentleman state it, if this was not the case.

Mr. GWIN. He stated, in his message, that the bonds were sold under par, and in violation of law.

Mr. GRANGER. But he signed the bonds.

Mr. GWIN. No doubt of that.

Mr. GRANGER. Governor McNutt signs these bonds, and then goes on to prove, by his report of the state of that bank and its condition, that there never had been a dollar in it but the results of these bonds, and to show that the property of this bank, to which the bondholders were to look, was not worth one dollar.

Mr. G. had not said anything here as of his own knowledge. He had spoken from the records, furnished not by those politically opposed to the gentleman, but by Governor McNutt himself and his political friends. Although the State of Mississippi, on her $2,000,000 bonds from the Planters' Bank, for which her faith had been pledged, had not paid her interest from 1839, owing to the embarrassments of the times, or perhaps to the fact that they looked to the bank, in the first instance, for payment, he had no imputation to make upon her from this cause. It arose from the embarrassments of the times. Be it so. He had only contended that the $5,000,000 of bonds having been made in good faith, and the money for them received, should at least have been acknowledged in good faith.

SPEECH OF MR. THOMPSON,

OF MISSISSIPPI,

In the House of Representatives, February 11, 1843.

The House resumed the consideration of the motion made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL,] to print 10,000 extra copies of the reports of the majority and minority of the Committee of Ways and Means against the proposition to issue $200,000,000 Government stock to be distributed to the States.

Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi said: I wish to call on this House to bear witness that neither my colleague nor myself has, in any way, thrust upon its consideration the refusal of our State to acknowledge her liability for the payment of the Union Bank bonds. And a disclaimer has been made, that, in alluding to this question, any personal reflection was aimed at her Representatives on this floor. Then it follows that the State of Mississippi has been attacked for her conduct in her sovereign and independent character; and, as the Representative of her people, I claim the right to be heard. But my remarks shall be purely defensive; and I will not be betrayed into an assault upon any other of these sovereign States. Sir, when any one of these twenty-six States has acted on any question pertaining to her internal policy alone, far be it from me to call in question the propriety of her conduct, the purity of her motives, or the honor or honesty of her principles. It shall be enough for me to know that the sovereign has willed it. In monarchical Governments, the principle of law is, that the King can do no wrong. In these twenty-six sovereignties, I feel bound to admit that no one of them can do or has done a dishonorable act. On the Supreme bench of the United States, the justices regard the decisions made in any one of the States, by the highest judicial tribunal known to such State, on any questions involving their municipal regulations, as binding upon them—not by statute, but by comity and respect for the authorities of the States. The policy adopted may be unwise, may be destructive of their best interests, but can never be destructive of their honor. This band of twenty-six States, with honor untarnished, will never, I trust, turn against each other and breathe out the foul breath of suspicion and distrust upon the fair name and good character of any one of them. The others will explain, palliate, defend, and justify the suspected and slandered party. When all others should leave and desert them, they will cleave to and maintain each other.

But, instead of this feeling, have we witnessed no anxiety among some of our sister States, and even on this floor, to condemn Mississippi for her late action, and proclaim that condemnation abroad. Instead of hearing her defence with patience and kindness, like sisters gangrened with jealousy at her former unrivalled prosperity, they are swift in the expression of their opinion of her fall, and show an anxiety that all the world should uncharitably and unhesitatingly condemn her. Some of the States who annually rob her, by virtue of your plundering protective policy, of more than a sufficiency to meet every dollar of interest accruing from her public debt, seem delighted to proclaim her dishonor to the world. Treated in this way, she entertains for all such expressions of sentiment and attempts at chastisement the most sovereign and ineffable contempt.

But an effort has been made on this floor, before the assembled Representatives of the people of the United States, to fix a stain upon the fair escutcheon of Mississippi. She has been charged with a refusal to pay her honest, just debts. A refutation of this charge is first required at my hands.

The gentleman from New York, [Mr. GRANGER,] in the discussion a few days since, adroitly evaded the points presented by my colleague, and endeavored to draw off the mind of the House to collateral and immaterial points. He assumed—1. That the Legislature and the Governor represented the State, and, in all their action with others, formed the State of Mississippi. 2. That this Legislature and Governor passed a law which authorized the issue of $5,000,000 bonds, on the faith and sole responsibility of the State. 3. That, in pursuance of that law, the Governor signed the amount of bonds, and affixed the seal of the State thereto, and delivered them, as bonds of the State, to the Union Bank. 4. That the Union Bank, as the agent of the State, sold the bonds at par, and received the money for and in behalf of the State; and, therefore, that the State, now that the money is squandered, is bound in good faith to acknowledge and pay the bonds.

I hope I state the gentleman's points fairly.

In reply, I deny that the Legislature and Governor represent the sovereignty of Mississippi, in an unqualified sense. We have a constitution; and that is the paramount law. That constitution has expressly forbidden the Legislature from doing certain things. It has fixed certain limits beyond which the Legislature cannot go, and bind the people legally or morally. Every friend of constitutional government will yield this position. With the most liberal construction of State constitutions, then, I will say that the Legislature and Governor can act for the State in performing everything which is not denied to them by the constitution; and everybody is bound to know what powers are denied to them.

In the second place, I deny that the Legislature ever passed a law which authorized the Governor of that State to subscribe for $5,000,000 of stock in the Union Bank, for and in behalf of the State; to issue the bonds of the State therefor, and pledge the faith of the State for their payment. It is true, a bill to that effect passed three several readings in the Legislature of 1838; but an express clause in our constitution, which has been read by my colleague, says such a bill shall not be a law, and receive the sanction and effect of law, until it has passed two consecutive Legislatures, and been published in the mean time in three newspapers of the State. When the Legislature of 1838 adjourned, this bill had been read three times, and it was in the way of becoming a law; but that Legislature refused to submit the law to the people, upon motion made in accordance with the requirements of the constitution; and adjourned, leaving it among the acts of that session. At that time, that bill was no more a law than is the bill upon your table creating an exchequer—having been read twice, and the Constitution requiring it to be read three times. The constitution of Mississippi required such a law—pledging the faith of the State—to be read six times; three times by each Legislature. And to call such a bill, when it has been read three times, a law, is a most intolerable fraud in legislation.

In the third place, I deny that the Governor issued the bonds of the State when he signed his name to these Union Bank bonds, and affixed the seal of the State thereto; because there was no law authorizing the issue of the bonds of the State, for the purpose of taking stock in the Union Bank for the State. What he did, therefore, was without authority, and in fraud of the people's rights; and therefore null and void.

In the fourth place, I deny that the bank was the agent of the State in selling and disposing of her bonds. For, though the Legislature has an undoubted right to create a banking corporation; and though a law may be constitutional in part, and thus far valid, while it is unconstitutional in other parts; yet, as the State had passed no law for the issue of these bonds, the Governor had executed them without authority. He disposed of them by delivery to the bank without authority; the bank received them without authority, and disposed of them to Mr. Biddle without authority from the people of the State of Mississippi.

Now, sir, here is the whole case: Certain bonds are out, signed by A G. McNutt, and having the great seal of the State affixed thereto; and, when these are presented, I admit a prima facie case is made out against the State. We plead non est factum. We say they are not our act and deed; and upon this issue we stand before the world. The burden of proof is upon us, and we show our constitution is the supreme law. To pledge the faith of the State, a bill must be read six times—three times by each consecutive Legislature. The pretended law, in pursuance of which the bonds in question were issued, was never read but three times; and therefore was a bill then pending, and not a law. We look into the contract of the sale of these bonds, and we find that the purchaser had not constructive, but actual notice of the provisions of the constitution, and the defectiveness of the law; for these facts are imbodied in the contract between the agents of the bank and the purchaser. We therefore say, You dealt with the bank; you did not trust the State; these are not our bonds; and, to admit them as such, would not only do violence to our fundamental law, but be admitting an untruth.

This is the position assumed by the State, in her Legislature. In these positions, I believe in my conscience she is right.

This is not the position occupied by Governor McNutt, whose course has been animadverted upon with so much severity. And I wish to inform the gentleman from New York, that Governor McNutt is not the State of Mississippi, and that the Legislature has not adopted his reasoning in resisting the acknowledgment of these bonds. As Governor McNutt signed the bonds, he cannot deny his authority, which the people do. But his position is this: He alleges, (and with truth,) that he delivered these bonds to the bank as escrows, to be valid against the State on the performance of certain conditions precedent: one was, that the bonds should not be sold below par. He contends (and the fact is so) that the bonds were sold below par, having been sold on a credit, and the bonds bearing interest from date. Another point is, that the bonds, by the endorsement of the bank, were made sterling bonds, in violation of the law of their creation. He further contends that there was fraud and collusion in the sale of the bonds; and, as the Executive of the State, he officially informed the purchasers of his belief of the existence of fraud, and of his determination to resist their payment. Years have transpired since that time; and yet the bond-holders have made no effort to disprove these allegations.

Section 10 of the general provisions of the constitution is in these words: "The Legislature shall direct by law in what manner and in what courts suits may be brought against the State." In pursuance of this provision, a law was passed giving this jurisdiction to our court of chancery; and an appeal can be taken by either party to the high court of errors and appeals. I believe all the judges upon the bench, in the chancery and court of errors and appeals, are kindly disposed to the payment of these bonds by the State. Why, then, have not the holders of these condemned bonds come before these courts, and met these charges? The courts are open, and they have declined to vindicate their rightful possession of the bonds in a legitimate way. They prefer to get the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRANGER] to pour out invective against Governor McNutt, and slander upon Mississippi.

[Mr. GRANGER here interrupted Mr. T., and said that he knew no one of the holders of these bonds.]

From this circumstance, however, the presumption is strong, if the conclusion is not inevitable that the bond-holders dared not come to the issue.

But why attack Governor McNutt? He is not the acting Governor of Mississippi. He is a private citizen. Nor was he the candidate when the people decided this question. The present chief magistrate of that State was, at that memorable era, (1838,) a member of the State Senate. He resisted then, with his strong and vigorous intellect, the panic and distress feeling which governed the Legislature. When that body read this supplement the third time, and refused to submit it to the people, he entered his solemn protest upon the journal of the Senate against the measure, as unconstitutional. This protest was published in most of our papers, and the purchasers of the bonds must have known the fact; and, in the year 1841, the people called him from private life, against his interest and his inclination; and, in spite of his protestations to the contrary, into the chief magistracy of the State, as the representative and imbodiment of the sentiments and feelings of the people on this question. On this question he took the high ground of constitutionality, on which the contest of 1841 turned.

We think we owe it to the cause of constitutional liberty to take the course we have pursued. It has cost the State no little effort to maintain the integrity of her institutions. We have had, and still have, obstinate prejudices to encounter; the frowns and denunciations of the interested to resist; and the averted looks of some of our best friends. But our people have never quailed. Slandered and denounced, we have stood the firmer and the more resolute in our settled purpose, with the hope that the day would come when our sister States would do us full and ample justice. We have passed the Rubicon; and to Rome we will go. We have the mens conscia recti; and we abide our time. But suppose we are wrong. Suppose our position is untenable; yet you must confess that we are frank, manly, fearless, and above disguise. You must admit, if we are sinners—which I emphatically deny—we are bold sinners. Our courage must command your respect, though our course may not meet your approbation. We do not mean to promise and deceive, when we do not mean to pay; we do not intend to sneak out of our liabilities; we do not intend to read homilies about the sanctity of contracts, and fulfil none of our own. There are ten States of this Union, and one Territory, now under protest; there are six more that borrowed money during the last year to meet the demands upon their treasury. There are seven that owe no debt, and three have passed thus far unscathed. Why, then, is there such a disposition to pounce upon my State? Our case will not answer as a precedent for any of you to repudiate your just debts. No State in the Union has such a horror of debt; and no State had endeavored so much to guard its people against debt as Mississippi. It was said by the gentleman from New York that he would not complain if we were to plead insolvency. If we would trample our constitution under foot, and acknowledge a null and void obligation, he would be content; but it was shameful to rely upon such obsolete ideas as the constitution. What we promise, we expect to pay; and when we do not expect to pay, we will not promise. And I can say to the gentleman from Maryland, there is one pass to which we will never come—there is one degree of self-abasement, at which the proud spirit of every Mississippian, be he Whig or Democrat, will start back from with shuddering and dismay. Mississippi, by or through any one of her Representatives, will never prostrate herself before the footstool of Federal power, and say, with a dogged and craven feeling, Pay my debs, or I will disgrace myself by repudiation; steal I must, if you do not give me money enough to keep me from starvation. If Mississippi cannot pay her debts, the whole affair shall be her own. She will scorn to involve others with her. She will suffer in silence the discredit and dishonor, if such it may be considered; but she will never ask her sister States to bear her burdens. If she has none of that spirit by which she could raise men to Heaven, I thank God she has none of that other spirit, by which she would drag angels down.

The gentleman from Maryland said that the issue was relief or repudiation. But I say, Assume the debts of the States to the amount of $300,000,000 in the way proposed, and the issue in this Government will be repudiation. And here, in advance, in my place, I avow the sentiment—that, in the event of that assumption, I am for an open, unqualified, and immediate repudiation of the whole mass. Now, sir, let that be written down as the opinion and unalterable resolve of one Representative on this floor. Should that vast Trojan horse, with the engines of destruction concealed in his cavity, be introduced into this hall through a breach of the Constitution—the solid walls which fortify our liberty—there is no escape but in repudiation. If that remedy be not applied, this happy and glorious Union will soon be forever severed in twain. The people of this country will never submit that the just shall suffer for the unjust, the prudent for the imprudent, the wise for the unwise. North Carolina will never submit to pay the debts of Indiana; nor will New Jersey agree to pay the debts of Pennsylvania.

Sir, no man feels more deeply for the States which are involved in debt than I do. No man sees more clearly the almost utter impossibility for several of them to extricate themselves from their financial difficulties. From my inmost heart, I sympathize with them; but may my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth—may this heart (which, I trust, beats with some little patriotism) cease to pulsate—before one word of censure shall escape these lips, let them adopt what policy soever they may deem best. I doubt not their honor; and, in their heavy embarrassments, they will do right. They have been cheated, deceived, misled. They have been lured, by the ignis fatuus of bank credits, from the old paths of economy into the quagmire of extravagance and profligacy; and now, in the hour of difficulty, the treacherous phantom vanishes into thin air. I will stand by the States; and I will palliate, excuse, and (as far as may be) justify their conduct. All of them together, and each separately, form my country: and the language of my heart is, May my country be always right; but, right or wrong, I will always stand by my country.

It is true, I say, that I cannot see how many of the States can pay their debts. No civilized nation, except this young giant, ever yet paid a foreign debt of any considerable amount. In some of the States, the exports—the surplus produce carried out of the State and sold—are about equal to the annual interest to be paid by such States. This interest will be so much subtracted from the active circulation. It is taken away, and no return is made for it. The rents and profits of farms, instead of being spent in their improvement and enlargement, will be carried away to the foreign lords of the manor. By this process, in a few years, the whole country would be involved in irretrievable and intolerable ruin. The entire debt of the States and cities, and Federal Government, is $279,388,760. The interest on this amount is $14,893,832. The whole export of domestic produce, in 1841, from the United States, was $106,000,000. Of this amount, 14 per cent. is to be paid for interest. This will exceed by far the profits on the export. It amounts to 85 cents on every barrel of flour, and $4 25 on every bale of cotton. Sir, it is evident that it cannot be paid. The effort will most surely involve us more deeply in distress and bankruptcy.

Mr. Speaker, I verily believe that, with the exception of the United States, there is scarcely a civilized nation in the world able to pay her debts. Suppose the interest on the English debt payable abroad for one year; at the end of that time, that supercilious and haughty Government would be brought low in the dust, and would become one splendid but desolate wreck. Her bank circulation is not quite £20,000,000. The amount of her annual taxation is about £60,000 000, or $300,000,000. Her annual interest is £30,000,000, or near $150,000,000. Now, suppose this entire sum of interest were due the 1st day of January, 1844, to be paid to France or this country, Great Britain would be drained of every dollar of bullion she possessed, and, on the day of payment, there would be an awful crash of her whole paper system. The purchase of foreign corn, a few years since, caused such a drain of bullion, as to shake the Bank of England to its centre. Her advantage now is, that her debt—near $4,000,000,000—is due at home, and in the payment of tax, and then of debt, the paper money of the kingdom, based upon the credit of the Government, flows in a circle, alsorbing at every revolution the profits of the industry of the mass, and aggregates them for the few; the quantity is not diminished, but it has the capacity of being almost indefinitely enlarged.

The debt of Austria is £80,000,000, or near $400,000,000; and her revenues the last year were insufficient to meet the demands upon her treasury. France owes £191,893,053, or near $1,000,000,000; and her income is inadequate to her wants, and she is in search of new objects of taxation. Holland owes £100,000,000; Denmark, £16,000,000; Prussia, £29,000,000; Naples, £20,000,000; Russia owes £50,000,000, or near $250,000,000; and Spain acknowledges a debt of £89,600,000, and she has £202,030,000 which she repudiates. But it is all the same; she pays none, and can pay none. Portugal's debt is £19,086,122, and she is unable to pay anything, and she has suspended. But it is cruel to turn to the South American Governments; they have all suspended, except the Brazils, whose debt is £15,500,000; and they are now enjoying all the prosperity of an expanded paper system, which will soon burst, and involve the Government in ruin and bankruptcy.

From this cursory review of the debts of nations, it is apparent that their debts can never be paid: and if it be conceded (which I do not, because the revenue in each one of the abovenamed nations, so far as I am advised, is now short of the accruing demands upon their treasury) that the interest on this stupendous mass of indebtedness will be met, yet generation after generation will be cursed with its weight—will be born with this pack-saddle on their backs, to be rode and spurred, and driven by the fundmongers and stockjobbers of the world. I am further persuaded, in my own mind, that the debts of many of the States cannot, and will never, be paid. But shall we desert our country in that event? Shall we desert it as a den of thieves and swindlers? Withered be the heart that could conceive such a thought; blistered be the tongue that could utter such a sentiment. In that event, what will become of the gentleman from New York? [Mr. GRANGER.] Which way will he go? To Texas? Why, she has twice repudiated. Moreover, the slave-owners might give the gentleman too warm a reception in that quarter. To Mexico? She is bankrupt, and has attempted to repudiate her honest debts. To England, the arrogant tone of whose citizens the gentleman has attempted to reflect on this floor?—to England, the great highway robber of the world?—to England, where he could join the hypocritical abolitionists in oppressing and aggrieving outraged Ireland?—to England, where 26,000,000 of pretended freemen are laboring and toiling by day, and shivering with cold and hunger, poverty and distress, by night, to pay the interest on her public debt, owned by 289,751 lords and proprietors of the country—a debt contracted in fraud, and perpetuated in the blood of her people—a debt which is so grinding the face of the great laboring mass, as will soon render their sufferings intolerable? Sir, England—exacting and purse-proud England—is the very mother of repudiation. The instances in her history are too numerous for me now to enumerate. I pass by her frequent depreciation of the current coin of the kingdom; thereby defrauding her public creditors of the difference. I pass by the unprincipled robbery of the depositors of their money in the exchequer, in the reign of Charles II, on the faith of the Government; by which thousands were directly or indirectly ruined. But the very foundation of her present debt is an enormous fraud. The Government borrowed $1,328,526, at 8 per cent., pledging her faith for its redemption; to be spent, I believe, in part, for her navy.

The Government soon suspended payment for one year, then indefinitely; the public creditors were involved in ruin; they brought suit in the courts, and, after twelve years, obtained judgment. The Chancellor of the Exchequer overruled the courts, and, on an appeal to the House of Lords, they reversed the decision of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The debt, by this time, amounted to £3,428,526 Parliament, at this stage, took it in hand, after a lapse of twenty-five years, and, by statute, declared the creditors should receive only 3 per cent. on the principal, and that the principal could be redeemed with one-half. Thus, a debt of $17,000 000, at 8 per cent., was reduced to $3,000,000, at 3 per cent. Hume speaks of it thus: "It was a forfeiture of public credit, and an open violation of the most solemn engagements, both foreign and domestic."

In the Long Parliament, the church lands were seized and disposed of. The money arising therefrom was appropriated by the Government. Afterwards, the lands were restored to the church; but the money received was most unjustly retained.

Again, in 1797, the Government forced the bank to suspend specie payment; and not long after, Parliament adopted this resolution: "That the notes of the Bank of England have been, and are at this time, held in public estimation equivalent to the legal coin of the same value, and generally accepted as such in all pecuniary transactions to which such coin is lawfully applicable." At that very time bank notes were 10 per cent. below par. Parliament, therefore, declared a falsehood; and they followed it up by passing a law, which punished with fine and imprisonment all persons who received it, or paid it away, for less than its par value. The bank notes afterwards depreciated 20, 30, 40, and, at one time, to 41 per cent. All public creditors were required to receive this depreciated paper, under heavy penalties for refusal; and the computation that, on the debt contracted before 1800, she gained (and of course creditors lost) by their payment of depreciated paper £37,000,000, or $137,000,000. This was a very pretty financial operation. If Mississippi were allowed to pay her debt in the depreciated bank paper of that State, she would soon be vastly easy on that score.

With these facts staring them in the face, does it not require a large share of Christian forbearance to hear Englishmen talk of the good faith and bad faith of nations? And how contemptible and humiliating it is to find an American citizen joining in the cry, and speaking of American bad faith and American dishonor, whose whole history presents the fairest page of any nation on earth on this subject! But if a man do not claim the rights and respect due to a gentleman, the world will not accord them to him: so it is with a nation. And it is due to England to say, that, when she robs and swindles, she does it boldly, by a statute, which receives the sanction of his most gracious Majesty, on whose vast empire, it is boastingly said, the sun never sets.

Suppose the gentleman should go to France: will he then have reached a soil which has never been stained with the damnable sin of repudiation? It was here (as Sir Walter Scott has it) "that the depreciated assignats were raised to par by guillotining those who sold or bought them for less than their full value." The livre current contains less than one sixty-sixth part of the coin it did in former times.

In 1797, the debt of France was $966,000,000; but, in order to continue the invasion of Germany and Italy, the army required $56,000,000; and it became necessary to make a decisive movement with the revenue of the Government; and this expedient was fallen upon: Two-thirds of the public debt—amounting to $644,000,000—was struck off, without any notice to the fund-holder, and without any excuse, save the wants of the army; leaving a public debt of only $322,000,000. Here is a flagrant and most outrageous repudiation of an amount more than double the whole indebtedness of the United States. Although this must be an acknowledged wrong, yet I like the spirit which prompts this justification by the French historian, M. Thiers: "Measures of this nature inflict, like revolutions, much individual hardship; but people must submit to them when they have become inevitable." The spirit which actuated the French historian in defending his country, forms a striking contrast to that evinced by the gentleman from New York.

Will the gentleman go to Spain? The requirements of her treasury this year are about $60,000,000. She has strained her taxing powers to the utmost, and the expectation is that the revenue will not exceed $40,000,000; and it is suggested that a proposition will be made to borrow money from the Shylocks of England, and allow the duties upon imports to be collected in English ports. But Spain is hopelessly bankrupt. It is no better with Austria and Holland, although, by heavy exertion, they continue to pay; but they have both twice repudiated heavy amounts. Where, then, will the gentleman go? To Portugal, Greece, Colombia, Buenos Ayres, Chili, Peru? They are all bankrupt. Where will he go? I judge it would suit him best to ingratiate himself with the Ottoman Porte. There he will find many a bright eye and ruddy cheek, and, in the opinion of my friend from Illinois, the gentleman excels in the parlor and drawing-room.

Now let us return to our own country. And how does she stand in history in regard to her own indebtedness? It is well known that, during the revolutionary war, Congress ordered to be issued, on the faith of the Government, $200,000,000 of what are called continental bills.* I learn from the Treasury Department, however, that $240,000,000 were de facto issued; and the last act in the drama is thus graphically drawn by Mr. Jefferson:

"It continued to circulate and depreciate till the end of 1780 when it had fallen to 75 for 1; and the money circulated from the French army being by that time sensible in all the States north of the Potomac, the paper ceased its circulation altogether in those States. In Virginia and North Carolina, it continued a year longer; within which time it fell to 1,000 for 1, and then expired, as it had done in the other States, without a single groan. Not a murmur was heard, on this occasion, among the people. On the contrary, universal congratulations took place on their seeing this gigantic mass, whose dissolution had threatened convulsions which should shake their infant confederacy to its centre, quietly interred in its grave. Foreigners, indeed, who do not, like the natives, feel indulgence for its memory, as of a being which has vindicated their liberties, and fallen in the moment of victory, have been loud, and still are loud, in their complaints. A few of them have reason; but the most noisy of them are not the best of them. They are persons who have become bankrupt by unskilful attempts at commerce with America. That they may have some pretext to offer to their creditors, they have bought up great masses of this dead money in America, where it is to be had at 5,000 for 1; and they show the certificates of their paper possessions, as if they had all died in their hands, and had been the cause of their bankruptcy."

This was not a dishonorable repudiation. Oh no! But here was a most sacred debt left unprovided for. I cast no censure upon our ancestors or ourselves for failing to redeem the national faith. It has all turned out right.

But again. The States issued $200,000,000 of bills of credit, as Mr. Jefferson estimates it; and what became of all that vast amount? Have the glorious Old Thirteen ever paid all their debts? If so, when? and how? Did Virginia, North Carolina, Maryland, Pennsylvania, or Massachusetts ever discharge their debts, for the payment of which they pledged their faith? Not a dollar, so far as I know and believe, was ever redeemed. And shall we put down all these revolutionary States as dishonored repudiators, for refusing to pay their honest debts? Not at all. They did right. Mr. Jefferson explains it in this way:

"Every one through whose hands a bill passed, lost on that bill what it lost in value during the time it was in his hands. This was a real tax on him." · · · · "A mode of taxation the most oppressive of all, because the most unequal of all."

Here is a history in advance of many of the State debts. Such is my candid opinion.

But, for the benefit of some of those who try to echo foreign sentiment and feeling on this floor, I wish to read another extract from Mr. Jefferson's letter to Mr. A. Stewart, written in Paris in 1786.

"American reputation in Europe is not such as to be flattering to its citizens. Two circumstances are particularly objected to us: the non-payment of our debts, and the want of energy in our Government. These discourage a connexion with us. I own it to be my opinion that good will arise from the destruction of our credit. I see nothing else which can restrain our disposition to luxury, and to the change of those manners which alone can preserve republican government."

Here you find the sentiment and feeling of a Republican and a patriot. All this was done by the most glorious class of politicians that ever lived. And suppose, in those days, a member of the American Congress had attempted to rise in his place and cast obloquy upon any member of this confederacy for refusing to provide for the payment of her honest debts, for which she had pledged her faith; the murmurs of discontent, if not

* NOTE.—Since the delivery of this speech, I find, by referring to the appendix to Mr. INGERSOLL's speech on the fiscal bank bill, that three hundred and sixty millions of dollars of continental money was issued as early as the year 1778, which was never redeemed. I wish this appendix could be read by every freeman in the United States.

of contempt, would have filled these halls, and the impudent member would have been silenced. Sir, when they formed that banner of stars and stripes, all felt an equal interest in the reputation of each; and if the brightness upon any one was to be dimmed by any means, they all felt a holy horror at committing the unholy deed. But what have we seen since this question has been up. A serious effort made to cast reproach and disgrace on one of these Stars. Suppose the gentleman should succeed, and persuade the world that one of these States has acted dishonorably, unworthily. How much has he gained? Would it give that gentleman any pleasure to damn the reputation of Mississippi? When her name for honor and fidelity was gone, would it produce a thrill in his heart for the world to point to him and say, "Thou didst it"

Does the gentleman suppose Mississippi will be induced to retrace her steps at his instance? Sir, I can quarrel with a man—if need be, fight him—afterwards explain the matter between us, forget the insult, shake hands, and be friends. But I can never forget or forgive a man who abuses my liege sovereign, my protector, my State, my country. As soon would I forget or forgive the slanderer who would spit his foul spleen upon the fair name of my mother. And I regret that there could have been found one individual on this floor who should endeavor to bring into disrepute the dear name of my beloved State. I let the papers pass—I care but little for them; they delight in slander, and to them it is sweeter far to publish racy abuse than common-place commendation. Moreover, they have their reward. But, sir, who is this Goliah of Gath, who volunteers to make a deadly pass at Mississippi. Who sets himself up to teach my constituents lessons in the code of honor, and to preach to them morality, good faith, honesty, and fair dealing? The boasted advocate of a "high protective tariff," a system of legislative robbery, laying burdens upon one portion of the Union and conferring bounties upon the other; and taking from the pockets of one part of the people without their consent, and bestowing upon another.

Again, he is the advocate of the system which borrows all and pays none. In his own State, he acted with the party who desired to run the State still further in debt, by appropriations and loans; while he refused to levy any additional tax to increase the revenue, when it was well known that the income was unequal to the accruing demands. And I put this question to the gentleman: Which is the greatest political sinner—the legislator who borrows money and squanders it, without providing for its repayment; or he who succeeds, and, finding the debt unprovided for, refuses to levy burdens upon his constituents for its payment? In my opinion, the first deserves the more decided censure. This is the identical individual who headed, in his own State, the great anti-masonic humbug movement. This is the self-same gentleman who authorized Gen. Harrison, at Richmond, to say he was no Abolitionist.

Mr. GRANGER here interposed, and said that he had given no such authority to General Harrison.

Mr. THOMPSON replied: I speak from rumor. But does the gentleman deny that he gave assurance, through one of his political friends, to the Senate of the United States, when his confirmation as Postmaster General was pending before that body, that he was no Abolitionist?

Mr. GRANGER then said he had never done so, in the sense in which the gentleman understood that term.

Mr. THOMPSON said he understood the gentleman distinctly to avow himself an Abolitionist, when interrogated at the last session by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. WATTERSON.]*

Mr. GRANGER said that he never was an Abolitionist; and he assured the gentleman that if he was one, he would take as much pride in avowing it, as he now did in denying it.

Mr. THOMPSON continued: The gentleman, after all this, has some nerve, to rise in his place and talk of fair dealing and straightforward conduct.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] strikes the wrong key when he supposes we are to be bullied into the assumption of State debts. The lesson we learned from his father was to do right, and let consequences take care of themselves; and, "sink or swim, survive or perish, live or die," we will stand by our judgments, and never counsel with our fears, in our legislative action. If Great Britain undertakes to become the high sheriff of the world, and goes out on this Quixotic expedition of collecting from the nations of the earth their debts, she will find herself greatly mistaken. In such an effort, in my opinion, she will soon be willing to enter upon the executions "satisfied in full."

The cry in this country has been "confidence, confidence." We must restore the confidence of the country. This was the catch-word in the great struggle of 1840—and that, too, by the very same party who, deceived and misled by the false reasoning of the bankers and financiers, sustained the banks in their open and acknowledged repudiation of their debts, while they declared the whole cours of the opposing party was war upon the banks. Their defalcations gradually destroyed all confidence in banks. Next followed the failure of the speculators; and they cried out for the same relief extended to the banks, by legalizing their suspensions of payment. These advocates for the restoration of confidence granted their request in the shape of stay-laws and stop-laws in the States, and of a bankrupt law here, which enabled them to repudiate their debts. This destroyed all confidence between individuals. Next, the tax-payer began to complain of his burdens; and he could not see the reason why banks and individuals should be released from their obligations, and yet the State should be required to pay the uttermost farthing on her imprudent contracts.

This defection of the tax payer impaired greatly the confidence in State credit. Then, for the relief of the States, unholy hands were laid upon the land revenue, and it was distributed among the States. This fund did not restore confidence and State credit; but its withdrawal impaired in no slight degree the confidence in the credit of Federal Government. Now, to consummate and destroy all confidence in that credit of the General Government, it is but necessary to authorize the issue of two hundred millions of bonds, for the payment of the State debts, when we can with the utmost difficulty command the means adequate to meet the ordinary expenditures of the Government. The acting of the last scene in this great drama will cause the total loss of all confidence in the Government itself, and a fatal stab will be given to constitutional liberty.

The gentleman from Maryland asks, What, then, is to be done? I say, economize your expenses, and husband your resources; borrow no more money, and create no additional debt; repeal your prohibitory tariff duties, and thus strike off the shackles from commerce. Say to the States, in decisive tones, This Government has no authority to take upon its shoulders your burdens; and it is vain, and worse than vain, to harbor such an expectation: meet your difficulties like men: what can be done, do; and do it frankly and fearlessly. Let us adopt for this Federal Government a settled financial policy, and let all look to the fruits of regular industry for relief. In this plain way, my word for it, this nation will soon be prosperous and happy.

The morning hour now expired.

*NOTE.—Extract from the speech of Mr. WATTERSON of Tennessee, on the veto message:

"The witness relied upon by Mr. WATTERSON, is a Mr. A. Sawyer.

"1st. Mr. GRANGER has said that he had yielded to the doctrines advocated by Mr. Slade, in his speech in regard to the District of Columbia, and that the notion of implied faith on the part of Virginia and Maryland must be given up.

"Mr. GRANGER rose and said, That is true.

"2d. Mr. GRANGER has said, that whenever it could be proved that slaveholders had called to their aid United States troops to put down an insurrection on the part of the slaves against the whites; or whenever it could be made to appear that United States troops had been used to sustain or protect slavery, that moment Congress would have power to abolish slavery in the different States.

"Mr. GRANGER admitted that, also, was true."

REMARKS OF MR. CAMPBELL,

OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

In the House of Representatives, February 24, 1843.—On House bill No. 649.

Mr. CAMPBELL said that the object of the bill under consideration was to suspend the operation of the second section, or districting clause, of the apportionment act, so far as it was calculated to affect the legality of elections to the 28th Congress.

From present indications, he thought that no reasonable doubt could be entertained, if unnecessary collisions were avoided, that this important section would be adopted in all the States. The opposition to it, at first so violent, was gradually yielding to an enlightened public opinion. The tocsin which at first so loudly proclaimed a danger to the rights of the States, that never existed, has almost ceased to sound; and, in every State of the Union except one, where the Legislature had assembled since its passage, the people, he believed, had, through their immediate constitutional organs, given unequivocal indications of their approbation of its principle. The exception to which he alluded was New Hampshire; and he had reason to believe that, if the excitement which unfortunately prevailed in that respectable State was allowed to subside, she would not be long in discharging a duty which is due, not less to her own high character for respect to the laws, than to the obligations she is under to the States united with her in the Federal compact.

The condition of things, however, in New Hampshire, is not the only obstacle to carrying the districting clause of the apportionment law into immediate operation. In Georgia, the election for Congress had taken place under the pre-existing general-ticket system, previous to the first meeting of her Legislature after the passage of the apportionment law; and although that body proceeded almost immediately to divide the State into congressional districts for the 29th and subsequent Congresses, yet, so far as the elections for the 28th Congress were concerned, the evil was without remedy; for, the election being held, the Legislature was incompetent to set it aside and order another in its place—the Constitution of the United States having vested in this House the exclusive right to judge of the "elections, returns, and qualifications of its members." The elections for Congress had also taken place for the next Congress, in Missouri, under the general-ticket system, previous to the meeting of her Legislature, now in session; and which body, he was informed, would, before its adjournment, divide the State into districts for the 29th and subsequent Congresses.

[Mr. EDWARDS, of Missouri, here rose and stated that he had just learned that the bill recently pending to divide Missouri into congressional districts had been lost.]

Mr. CAMPBELL was sorry to hear it; but, remarking that the intelligence did not affect his argument, continued. The election for Congress under the general ticket will also occur in Mississippi before the meeting of her Legislature, which will not regularly convene until about the time of the meeting of Congress, and where it is well understood that the Governor will not call an extra session.

Under these circumstances, Mr. C. thought that not only sound policy, but justice, required the passage of the bill under consideration, or one of a similar character. If Congress refused to do so, the next House of Representatives must exclude the representatives of the people of at least three States, who have had no opportunity of complying with the law.

He had been asked why he was so desirous to procure the suspension of a law which, at the last session of Congress, he had not only supported, but had introduced? He would state, in reply, that his opinion in relation to the districting clause of the apportionment law had undergone no change, either in relation to its expediency or constitutionality. Indeed, the more he had reflected upon it, the more he was convinced of its salutary conservative principles. The reasons why he desired its temporary suspension were simply these: First, by a course of conciliation, to receive its ultimate triumph; second, to avoid the confusion and delay that will otherwise certainly occur at the next session of Congress; and, third, to enable the people of those States where no provisions have been made for district elections, and particularly of those States where the people have had no opportunity of conforming to the law, to be represented at the commencement of the next Congress.

It was true, he had been informed, previous to the final passage of the apportionment law, that in some of the States the elections would be held under the existing regulations, previous to the regular time of the meeting of their Legislatures; but, in endeavoring to obtain the passage of a law which contained principles, as he thought, vital to the existence of our institutions, he was unwilling to encumber it with details, suggested by the accidental condition of things that existed in some of the States. Nor did he suppose that any evil would probably result from such a course, beyond the expenses of an extra session of the Legislature in States so situated—an expense that would have been tenfold compensated to those having it to pay, by affording them an opportunity of being represented in the next Congress by Representatives freely chosen by themselves, and elected upon principles in conformity with the principles of the Constitution.

Mr. C. here expressed his disappointment, surprise, and regret, that persons who had been elevated to the chief magistracy, under the free institutions of any of the States of this Union, should manifest such a contempt for the opinions of the people by whom they were elevated, as to decide for them, instead of allowing them to decide for themselves the momentous question of whether they would, or would not, be represented in the 28th Congress in conformity to the provisions of the existing law. Such, however, had unfortunately been the case. In two of the States, from the Governors refusing to call an extra session of their respective Legislatures, the elections have come on under circumstances in which the people have had no possible opportunity of deciding this important question for themselves. In another State, the same evil would certainly occur. Persons, thus chosen contrary to law, will present themselves at the bar of the next House of Representatives claiming admission to seats; and, considering the party aspect which the subject has unfortunately and unaccountably assumed, unless this bill or one of a similar character is adopted, a collision will probably occur, such as has never before been witnessed in a legislative hall—a collision which, however little we may care for the consequences of it, to ourselves personally, it is the part of wisdom and of patriotism rather to avoid, than voluntarily and unnecessarily encounter; particularly as such a collision will rather endanger than insure the triumph of those great conservative principles, which the universal adoption of the districting clause of the apportionment law will establish and perpetuate; and which he believed not only to be important, but essential to the existence of our institutions.

Among the considerations which could not fail to recommend the districting clause of the apportionment law to the confidence of the American people, he enumerated:

1st. Its importance in restoring uniformity in elections, and equality of political influence in the House of Representatives to the citizen population of the different States.

2d. The preservation of the freedom of elections, which could not exist where the general-ticket system prevailed, and where the dearest, most sacred, blood-bought right of American citizens—that of voting for persons of their own choice to represent them—was reduced to the poor privilege of sanctioning at the polls the edicts of a few political jugglers, who form themselves into a self-constituted oligarchy, to rule and direct the elections of the State.

3d. Its importance in restoring the Democratic principle of the Government, now entirely destroyed wherever the general-ticket system prevails.

4th. To preserve the influence of the small States from being engulphed in the vortex of the universal adoption of the general-ticket system—a crisis to which we were rapidly hastening, and to which, but for the action of Congress, we would soon have arrived.

5th. To enable minorities to be represented, which was essential to freedom in a representative Government; and whose voice is entirely silenced in this hall, from all the States where the general ticket prevails.

6th. To preserve the representation of feelings, and interests, and opinions, from different sections of the country, without respect to geographical lines; and thus to guard against those concentrated movements of the North against the South and the South against the North; the first effect of which would be the oppression of the minority section, and ultimately the dissolution of the Union.

These, and other considerations, cannot fail to recommend the districting clause of the apportionment law to the confidence of the people, and, if left to operate upon their unbiased judgments, must insure to it universal approbation. Let us not, then, (said Mr. C.) jeopard, by an attempt at coercion, what we shall certainly obtain by a course of conciliation. This Government originated, and must be maintained, in a spirit of conciliation and compromise. It rests upon the confidence and affections of the people for its support; and every difference of opinion, honestly entertained, is entitled to be treated with respect. If, then, the delusion still unhappily prevails in some of the States, that this law of Congress is an aggression on State rights, time for reflection, and not an attempt at coercion, is our remedy. And when the people become convinced (as they soon will, if causes of excitement are removed) that the action of Congress has not relieved the State Legislatures from the obligations imposed upon them by the Constitution, they will demand the adoption of such regulations as are necessary to carry it into effect.

If the bill under consideration be adopted, all immediate excitement will subside, and the law will go quietly, peacefully, and universally into operation. If the bill is not adopted, the spirit of resistance will be kept alive, and perhaps the ultimate fate of the law itself be rendered doubtful. But even if at the next session of Congress it should be trampled in the dust by a party majority, he had the consolation to believe that the enormities of the general-ticket system being now laid before the country, and the attention of the people attracted to them, it would be universally repudiated, and our institutions saved from the evils under which they were laboring from its partial, and the danger of still greater evils to which they were exposed from its universal adoption. The seed is sown, and has taken root; which, whether the districting clause is treated as a nullity, or repealed, or remains upon the statute-book, will produce through all the States, in a very few years, the adoption of its principles.

There were other considerations which demanded imperatively the passage of this bill. Under the present depressed state of the demand for agricultural products, everything like a speculative demand for the public lands has terminated. Add to this, that under the pressure of the existing system of exorbitant cash duties, our import trade had rapidly declined; and it was certainly probable that an empty treasury and an indebted Government would, at the next meeting of Congress, demand the immediate attention of the House of Representatives.

Gentlemen cannot have forgotten the scene which occurred here at the commencement of the 26th Congress, when, in consequence of the difference of opinion that existed in relation to the election returns from the State of New Jersey, party feeling was excited to a degree of phrensy, that silenced for a time the voice of reason and moderation; and more than three weeks were spent in scenes of tumult, before this House was organized. If difficulties in the election from a single State were sufficient to produce this effect, what may we not expect when persons claiming to be the Representatives of three or four States, not elected in conformity to law, shall claim to be admitted to seats!

Confident as he was of the constitutionality of the existing law, he could have no hesitation, however disagreeable it might be if its operation was not suspended, to reject the pretensions of every person not elected in conformity to its provisions. But what he conceived to be the path of duty was not equally plain to others; and he could not forget the threats that had been made by its opponents, to treat it as a nullity, and trample it under foot. He trusted that such an outrage would never be perpetrated on the floor of an American Congress; but, in the present state of party feeling, he could not doubt that party enthusiasts would be returned to the next Congress, who would endeavor to carry this threat into execution, and who, if they succeed in nothing else, may at least produce confusion and delay.

Sir, (said Mr. C.,) I do not repudiate the existence of party. On the contrary, when stimulated by patriotism, and controlled by reason, I acknowledge its benefits in the administration of the affairs of Government. But when these barriers are broken down, and party becomes the mere plaything of passions that contend against and inflame each other—of resentments that seek for gratification, and of ambition that looks to its own aggrandizement—it has ever been, and will ever be, the bane of Republics. Sir, if the fate of this Republic could be written on the walls of this Capitol, as was the fate of Babylon on the palace of her kings,—party—party—party would be the inscription.

If this bill, offered in a spirit of conciliation, did not pass, he hoped that the friends of order would march to the polls with a banner on which shall be engraved "The Constitution and laws passed in conformity thereto;" and that every candidate for Congress will be called upon to declare before the people whether he intends to resist by force the existing law, at the risk of turning this hall of legislation into a scene of tumult, and confusion, and perhaps of bloodshed. The opponents of the districting clause of the apportionment law may be assured, let them be ever so determined to trample it under foot, that there will be others here equally determined to maintain it. The bill under consideration afforded a common ground, upon which the friends and opponents of the measure might meet without any surrender of principle; and while its adoption would remove the danger of the dreadful conflict that may otherwise occur at the next session of Congress, it will insure the ultimate triumph of the law itself. He also supposed the possibility of an extra session of Congress; and asked if the House of Representatives would not present a most interesting spectacle, if it should pass the entire time, that ought to be devoted at such a session to the interests of the country, in vain attempts to organize! The only possible means of avoiding the danger of such a result, was to adopt the bill under consideration, or one of a similar character.

He would now reply to the objection that had been suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. TURNEY,] since he had commenced addressing the House, and to which the gentleman requested an answer, to wit: "That Congress has no right, by law, to affect the validity of elections that had already occurred." Mr. C. had anticipated this objection, and thought that he was prepared to give to it a satisfactory answer; and, although he admitted that Congress was not competent by law to declare an election void, that was good at the time that it occurred, he insisted that the converse of the proposition was not true.

Congress, clearly, has no right by law to declare an act penal, which was not so when performed; for such a law would be ex post facto in its operation, and unconstitutional. But, although Congress has not the power to make an act penal, which was innocent when performed, it has an indisputable right, for good and sufficient reason, to remit from a penalty that has been incurred: provided that, by so doing, no private right, nor the rights of any community, are injuriously affected. Congress has the right, for example, to remit penalties that have been incurred by attempted violations of the revenue laws. And, in further illustration of his position, he had alluded to a petition which had been submitted by certain railroad companies, to suspend the operation of that part of the tariff act which required that all iron laid down after the 4th of March next should pay duty. No one had denied, or could deny, that Congress had the right to grant the relief asked for in this petition, which he insisted might be done by law, passed either before or subsequent to the 4th of March, and which might be both retrospective and prospective in its operation.

The examples to which he had alluded bore, he thought, a strong analogy to the objects of the bill under consideration, so far as the question of constitutional power was involved. There was, however, an important difference on the score of justice; for, while it was difficult to suppose that violations of the revenue could be involuntarily attempted, we knew that in two of the States the elections had taken place under circumstances in which the people have had no opportunity of conforming to the law the operation of which he proposed to suspend, so far as the elections for the next Congress were concerned. In a third State, the same thing would occur.

Mr. C. requested gentlemen to mark the broad distinction between ex post facto and retrospective laws. Ex post facto laws were necessarily retrospective, but retrospective laws were not necessarily ex post facto; and while it was a direct and palpable violation of the Constitution to pass the one, sound policy, substantial justice, and the public good frequently required the other.

In support of his views, Mr. C. quoted, from Dallas's Reports, the opinions of Justices Chase, Iredel, &c., in delivering the opinion of the court, seriatim; and, to show the operation of a repealed law on penalties incurred under it while existing, he quoted from the opinions of Chief Justice Marshall, and from the report of the Committee of Elections, to which the bill under consideration had been referred, and by which it had been reported back to the House.

In conclusion, he again urged the passage of the bill, and reiterated his conviction of the benefits that would result from its adoption.

REMARKS OF MR. PENDLETON,

OF OHIO.

In the House of Representatives, January 27, 1843—On the several plans of exchequer.

Mr. SPEAKER: Some weeks since, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PROFFIT] told the House that, while at Cincinnati, on his way to Washington, he was informed that petitions in favor of the exchequer, in that city alone, had received five thousand signatures. I presume I have received all these petitions—some in favor of the Executive plan, others in favor of the congressional plan; though the advocates of the latter are few, very few, in comparison with those of the former. The gentleman who brought these petitions to Washington informed me that they contained about twelve hundred names. Be that as it may, I recognise among them many of my personal friends of both political parties, whose opinions and wishes are entitled to receive from me the most respectful consideration. Shortly to retire from public life, to renew my associations with these petitioners—an association (I trust I may say it without offence) much more agreeable to my taste and habits than anything I have met with here—I could not but be most anxious to bring myself to think with them—to reconcile a vote in accordance with their wishes, to the paramount duty I owe to my country and its Constitution. Before I can give this vote, however, I feel I am obliged to remove out of my way the report of the Committee of Ways and Means upon the treasury exchequer; for I do not suppose that those of my constituents who have joined in these petitions expected that I would adopt their suggestions without reflection, or support them against the deliberate and well-matured convictions of my own judgment. The report of the Committee of Ways and Means reviewed the exchequer schemes, not only as measures of finance, but as sources of Executive power and patronage, and set forth the objections to them in both characters. Should I now vote for these schemes, or either of them, without being able to remove these objections, these petitioners, (or many of them, at all events,) I well know, would scorn the facility of my compliance. I am acting, too, under very different responsibilities from those which rested upon my constituents when they signed these memorials: some, because they approved the plans—some, perhaps, to get rid of importunate solicitation. The objections to which I have referred, I approached with every disposition to remove them. The argument in which they are contained, I examined with every disposition to refute it. I frankly confess I have been able to do neither the one nor the other. Thus baffled, I was willing to attribute my failure, not to the impregnable position of the report, but to the weakness of the assailant. Having since found, however, that both the gentlemen from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING and Mr. WINTHROP] have failed in similar attempts, I gained comfort in my own defeat, and confidence in my own conclusion.

The several reports now in the consideration of the House present three plans of finance and currency:

1. Sub-treasury.
2. The exchequer proposed by the select committee.
3. The exchequer recommended by the President.

There is a fourth plan—a bank of the United States—which, to be sure, is not now before the House, but to which it may be proper to allude, as, in case of the rejection of these three, it is the only alternative. I say the only alternative; for, although the time was, (and that not very long since,) when parts of this hall would have resounded with praises of a fifth plan, yet we are told, in the minority report, by the gentlemen from South Carolina and New Hampshire, [Messrs. PICKENS and ATHERTON,] "No one contends for the State bank system." And is it so, sir? Have we this acknowledgment from that quarter? What! not one, of all its friends—not one? But yesterday, and this league of confederated banks—the pride and refuge of the Democracy—might have stood against the world; now, none so poor to do it reverence. We cannot but recollect that such things were. Let me remind gentlemen that, a short time since, such a declaration would have subjected them, as it subjected us, to the fiercest invectives of their political friends.

The deposites were removed from the Bank of the United States in the summer of 1833; and in his message of that year (the first of his second term) General Jackson said:

"I am happy to know that, through the good sense of our people, the effort to get up a panic has hitherto failed; and that, through the increased accommodations which the State banks have been enabled to afford, no public distress has followed the exertions of the bank."

In his second annual message of December, 1834, General Jackson remarks:

"Happily it is already illustrated that the agency of such an institution (Bank of the United States) is not necessary to the fiscal operations of the Government: the State banks are found fully adequate to the performance of all services which were required of the Bank of the United States, quite as promptly, and with the same cheapness. They have maintained themselves and discharged all their duties while the Bank of the United States was still powerful, and in the field as an open enemy; and it is not possible to conceive that they will find greater difficulties in their operations when that enemy shall cease to exist."

The third message, of December, 1835, contains the following strong language:

"By the use of the State banks, which do not derive their authority from the General Government, and are not controlled by its authority, it is ascertained that the moneys of the United States can be collected and disbursed without loss or inconvenience, and that all the wants of the community in relation to exchange and currency are supplied as well as they ever have been before."

Of the State banks, General Jackson, in his last message in 1836, after a trial of between three and four years, speaks in the following decisive manner:

"Experience continues to realize the expectations entertained as to the capacity of the State banks to perform the duties of fiscal agents of the Government. At the time of the removal of the deposites, it was alleged by the advocates of the Bank of the United States that the State banks, whatever might be the regulations of the Treasury Department, could not make the transfers required by the Government, or negotiate the domestic exchanges of the country. It is now well ascertained that the real domestic exchanges, performed through discounts by the United States Bank and its twenty-five branches, were at least one-third less than those of the deposite banks for an equal period of time; and if a comparison be instituted between the amounts of service rendered by these institutions on the broader basis which has been used by the advocates of the United States Bank, in estimating what they consider the domestic exchanges transacted by it, the result will be still more favorable to the deposite banks."

After stating the large amounts of public money which had been transferred and paid by the deposite banks, the message adds:

"These enormous sums of money first mentioned have been transferred with the greatest promptitude and regularity; and the rates at which the exchanges have been negotiated previously to the passage of the deposite act, were generally below those charged by the Bank of the United States. Independent of these services, which are far greater than those rendered by the United States Bank and its twenty-five branches, a number of the deposite banks have, with a commendable zeal to aid in the improvement of the currency, imported from abroad, at their own expense, large sums of the precious metals for coinage and circulation."

You will observe, sir, there is nothing hypothetical in this language. It is not supposed, or conjectured, or anticipated. No; "it is ascertained"—"well ascertained;" after three years' trial, "experience continues to realize" the capacity of the State banks to accomplish all that was expected from them. This same language was held by the whole party, through the columns of their papers, and in both Houses of Congress. Why, then, does no one contend for this vaunted State-bank system now? Because it has failed. And did we not tell you it would fail? Did you not call us panic-makers? And did not you tell us then, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] tells us now, that the idea of a Bank of the United States was an exploded bank fallacy? This system, at all events, was your system. You lauded it to the skies. It was not possible it should fail; and when your present equally infallible expedient was first suggested, were we not told by authority, which you seldom ventured to question, "that it was against the genius of our free institutions to lock up in vaults the treasure of the nation?" "No one contends for the State-bank system now;" and yet, with this acknowledgment upon your lips of the entire failure of your first infallible plan, you ask us, upon no better authority, to take your second plan. I lack faith, gentlemen. When your sub-treasury shall be reinstated, if you ever have the power to reinstate it, (which, let me say, depends upon more than your getting a majority in Congress,) and shall have been in operation as long as your State-bank system has been, we shall hear from some subsequent committee, claiming infallibility for a new project, "no one contends for the sub-treasury now."

We have recently had on this floor a somewhat curious illustration of modern democracy. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. MCKEON,] while he praised the liberal use of the veto power by the President, rejected, in the name of his party, the supposed advances of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING,] because Mr. Tyler had approved and signed the bill repealing the sub-treasury law. The people had decreed this repeal; yet the Democracy cannot forgive the President for enforcing their decree. They praise him for disappointing the expectations of the people, and only censure him when he complies with them. This sub-treasury scheme was four times urged by Mr. Van Buren upon Congress, and thrice rejected; nor did it receive their reluctant assent until the 4th of July, 1840. The bill signed on that glorious day, we all recollect, was trumpeted throughout the land as a second declaration of independence; and yet, within four short months, the measure and its author were rejected together by the people of the United States, by overwhelming majorities.

Assuming, then, the sub-treasury to be lying under this condemnation, let us compare with it the plan of an exchequer recommended by the special committee.

The sub-treasury provides simply a fiscal agent to keep and disburse the public money.

The exchequer proposes to do the same thing, and substantially in the same way. In addition to this, the exchequer provides for a national paper currency.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSH-

ING,] in his speech the other day, said that a bank of the United States was wished by its advocates, "not from a desire that they might obtain loans, for there was already too much bank capital in the country, and facility enough to obtain loans;" and yet, but the moment before, the gentleman had asserted that "there existed now no bank of the United States, and very few specie-paying banks of any sort." The great error of the gentleman's whole argument is this assumption, that "there are facilities enough to make loans." This is not the case—at all events, in Ohio. Our want is capital. We want, through the facilities of well-regulated specie-paying banks, to be able to develop the great resources of our State, to get our produce to market, and anticipate the results of all our labor. This is our want—our only want. We have a hardy, enterprising, intelligent, industrious population of 1,800,000 souls, spread over a region of unexampled fertility—one frontier resting on the Ohio, the other on the lake, intersected in every direction by large and numerous rivers, and crowned with a temperate and healthy climate. With all these blessings of a beneficent Providence showered upon us in inexhaustible profusion, what more can we want to be prosperous and happy? We want that very thing which, it is the boast of the gentleman, his exchequer will not and cannot give us—the facility of making temporary loans, to be repaid out of the sales of the produce of our farms and the manufactures of our shops. This facility was afforded us in the olden time by the Bank of the United States, through its branch at Cincinnati.

With the proceeds of a discounted note, the merchant purchased of the farmer his pork, flour, and other produce. While the note was running to maturity, these articles which it had purchased were shipped to market; when at maturity, the note was taken up by a bill of exchange for the amount of the sales of these same articles. This bill the bank disposed of to the importing merchant, at ½ to ¾ per cent.; who was thus enabled to pay his Eastern and foreign debts. Under this circulation, originally set in motion by judicious credit, all the channels of business were full; every interest flourished. The merchant, farmer, manufacturer, carrier, bank—all received fair and remunerating prices; all was activity; all was joy. Sir, I have not the heart to turn to the present sad reverse of this happy picture. Although, thank God, we are not quite dead, yet the Spanish epitaph may well apply to us:

"We were well—
We would be better:
We took physic—
Here we lie."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to compare these two measures—the sub-treasury and the exchequer—with a view to their several effects upon the currency. The sub-treasury provides, that after the 30th day of June, 1843, all payments to the United States shall be made in gold and silver; and the exchequer provides that these payments shall be made in—1st, gold and silver coin; 2d, certificates of deposites, public and private; 3d, treasury notes; and 4th, notes of specie-paying banks. Let us see if there be any material difference between the two. The first medium of payment, gold and silver coin, is the same in both. By the fifth section of the bill, it is made lawful for the exchequer and its agencies, wherever established, to receive on deposite gold and silver coin, and bullion, the property of individuals, not exceeding in amount ten millions of dollars, and to give certificates of such deposite. The board of exchequer and its agencies are also authorized and directed, in all cases where the public creditors may prefer the same, to issue to them certificates of deposite for the amount of debts due to them by the United States; the amount of which certificates shall not exceed ten millions of dollars. Power is also conferred upon the proper officers of the mint, and branch mints, to issue like certificates for the amount of all deposites of bullion, &c. for coinage. All these certificates are redeemable, on presentation, at the office, agency, or mint where issued.

Now, sir, notwithstanding all this parade and promise, a very superficial examination will show that this whole scheme is a mere substitution of a paper for a metallic currency, and adds not one cent to the amount of the circulation. Observe that all these certificates, whether public or private, by whomsoever given, represent gold and silver coin and bullion. So far as they represent the first, they add nothing to the circulation; for the gold and silver coin must first be withdrawn before the certificate can get into circulation; and the coin can only again occupy the channels of circulation when the certificate is redeemed and withdrawn. To the amount that these certificates represent bullion, they increase the quantity of currency, making bullion in deposite for coinage answer the purpose of coin. These mint certificates, however, let it be recollected, only add to the circulation during the time consumed in the process of coinage; for so soon as the bullion is converted into coin, it would at once enter into the general circulation, but for the outstanding certificate which represents it, and for the redemption of which the coin must remain in deposite at the mint where the certificate is redeemable.

I greatly doubt the wisdom of the authority given to your officers to pay the public debts in certificates of deposite, which can only be given when there is in deposite, at the agency where the account is presented, an equal amount of specie belonging to the Government. You have the money lying by you idle, for which you have no immediate use; and the great merit of this contrivance is, that, instead of paying your debt with it at once, you incur all the risk of safekeeping the money, and give your note in payment of your treasury warrant. Why not let the treasury warrant circulate? There is too much of the economy of the spendthrift in this. It is a part of the clumsy apparatus by which a paper currency is to be substituted for a metallic. Treasury notes are pointed out as a third medium of payment of dues to the United States. There is, however, no provision in this bill for issuing treasury notes; there will, therefore, be none under its authority to be paid in. Those issued under existing laws are already made receivable at the treasury by those laws. Notes of specie-paying banks are also to be received; but, as they are never to be paid out by the Government, their circulation is arrested the moment they are paid in. The actual operation of this bill is to diminish the amount of the currency until these notes are presented and redeemed, when the bank may re-issue them. In the interval, the coin for their redemption is locked up from circulation in the vaults of the bank, and the notes are locked up in the vaults of the treasury.

This comparison of the operation of the two systems upon the currency shows very little to the advantage of the exchequer over the sub-treasury. Neither adds anything to the amount of circulation. Indeed, this is one of the great merits of his plan, claimed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, both in his report and in his speech. In the former, it is put quite as metaphorically as the subject will bear: "For every paper eagle on the wing, you have a gold eagle in hand."

How, then, is that bill to improve the currency, and remedy existing evils? If individuals make deposites, and the Government creditors receive certificates, you will have in circulation twenty millions of Government paper in lieu of twenty millions of coin in deposite. But, in the contingency that no private deposites be made, and your creditors prefer payment of their debts in specie to taking your notes, this plan will have no effect upon the currency, except to withdraw from general circulation gold and silver for Government use; and its identity in this respect with the sub treasury cannot be questioned.

But suppose the twenty millions of Government paper in circulation: I am not disposed, in the slightest degree, to undervalue the advantages and conveniences of such a currency to the treasury and to commerce; but I doubt exceedingly whether Government will find in these advantages a compensation for the hazard of safekeeping this amount of coin, and the risk of this complex machine not working perfectly and promptly in all its parts and at every point. This most delicate operation of producing and reproducing this vast amount of Government money; of having at all times the constituent coin ready for the appearance of its representative paper, is necessarily confided to a great number of agents, ignorance or infidelity in any one of whom mars the whole system, and your treasury feels the shock in all its departments. The various parts of this complicated machine, although at great distances from each other, are so geared and coupled together, that a failure anywhere will disturb, if it do not destroy, the motion of the whole. It is one vast chain drawn over the whole length and breadth of the land, and the severance of any one link, "tenth or ten thousandth, breaks the chain alike." Imagine one of these Government certificates, whether for a private deposite or a public debt, presented and protested for non-payment: I care not what may be the cause—ignorance, inadvertence, or inability; universal panic will be the immediate consequence; and as fast as the mails can carry them, all other outstanding certificates, fellows of the dishonored one, having lost their credit, would find their way to the places of redemption. Thus would end your national paper currency.

But, Mr. Speaker, if the Government be willing to assume the responsibility to which I have referred, will individuals find their account in making deposites? I can imagine no inducement to do so, except at points where commercial balances accumulate. A certificate, redeemable at the place where these balances are to be adjusted, would certainly be at a premium at the debtor point. Not so in any other case. A certificate, the specie to pay which is deposited in Cincinnati, will pay a debt in New York only at a discount equal to the expense of transporting the specie from Cincinnati to New York.

But, sir, if individuals should be inclined to make these deposites, will the several States permit your agencies to receive them? If not, this vaunted national paper currency, which is to achieve such wonders, is at once reduced one-half, or in the proportion of the ten millions allotted to the prohibiting States.

Since the attempt of certain politicians to control the Bank of the United States, in the person of Jeremiah Mason, this question of the currency has entered into all the arrangements and conflicts of party, and I fear there is no reason to doubt it will continue to do so.

Much is said in this report, and more elsewhere, of the evils inseparable from the expansibility of a paper currency. I do not intend to enter into that question. If it be an evil, this power of the States over your agencies will perpetuate it, and make the expansion and contraction of your national paper currency as certain—almost as regular—as the rising and falling of the tides. When the friends of this national exchequer have the ascendancy in the State Legislatures, your agencies will be permitted to receive private deposites and give certificates, and your paper currency expands. When power shall have changed hands—and on this very question, too; for it will be a perpetual and prolific source of party strife—prohibition will be enforced, and your paper currency contracts. It vacillates with the vacillations of party. The currency—which the interests of Government and people alike require shall be stable, and removed as far as possible from the revolutions and vicissitudes from which no human affairs are entirely exempt—is thus, by the inherent defect of its original formation, by the very law and condition of its existence, fastened to and made to follow the mutations of the most fickle and fluctuating of those affairs—the ever-varying party politics of the day.

Mr. Speaker, passing from this view of the subject, let me call your attention to the 12th section of this bill, which recognises the authority of the States to prohibit, by law, your agencies receiving private deposites of gold and silver coins, and giving certificates therefor. It is not my intention to follow the gentleman from Kentucky in his objections drawn from the principles of the Constitution. I shall illustrate my opposition from principles asserted and arguments contained in the report, and from other provisions of the bill. The project of an exchequer, recommended by the President, contains a provision similar to this. The remarks, therefore, I feel called upon to make upon this part of the subject, are equally applicable to both.

A principal advantage of the plan insisted upon by the committee in their report, is, that "it provides and secures a national paper currency." One of the modes indicated of providing this currency, is, conferring upon the exchequer and its agencies authority to receive, on private deposite, gold and silver coin and bullion, the property of individuals. Of course, the committee thinks it within the constitutional competency of Congress to adopt this mode—to confer this authority; and that a law for that purpose is in accordance with the Constitution of the United States, and, therefore, the supreme law of the land, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding. And yet the committee, in the same breath, by this 12th section, recommend that we reverse this order of precedency, and make an unconstitutional State law supreme, and a constitutional United States law subordinate.

We are also told, Mr. Speaker, in this report, with some pomp and circumstance, "that in all communities, and in every form in which currency exists, whether as coined money or as paper representative of it, and whether this be issued by banks or by public authority directly, the question of the currency of the country and that of its fiscal affairs are inseparable facts." The committee has deemed it consistent with this strong affirmation to recognise by this twelfth section the authority of the States to separate finance from currency; and compelling them to tolerate the one, allows them to reject the other. But, if they be inseparable facts, it is because they are so blended as not to be capable of severance, without injury, if not destruction, to both; because so dependent each upon the other, that they cannot exist in a separate state; and yet this fatal separation you permit, if you did not invite the States to make it.

We are further informed in the report, that "the radical difficulty in the whole matter of the currency" is, "that of the sovereign function to make, issue, and regulate money, (or its substitute,) the States possess a part in common with the General Government." The exercise by the States of this sovereign function is, by the report, if not in express terms, yet by the strongest implication, denounced a usurpation. This usurpation the bill proposes to legalize; for, of a paper currency, one of the most important regulations regards its amount or quantity; and, of the sovereign function to make this regulation, you divest yourself, and, by this twelfth section, (to the extent, at all events, of one-half) you transfer it to the States. This "radical difficulty," then, is only stated by the committee in their report, to be confirmed and perpetuated in the bill.

In a similar spirit we are told, in the report, that the Federal Government can provide a national paper currency of "adequate quantity;" but, by the bill, the State Governments, in direct opposition to the Federal Government, are made the ultimate judges, within certain limitations, of this adequate quantity.

The committee quotes, with approbation, the assertion of Mr. Dallas of the power of the Government to "supply and maintain a paper medium of exchange;" and yet, sir, by their bill, they put it in the power of the States to cut off this supply as caprice or passion may dictate.

Mr. Speaker, I care not what set of words is used; I care not how the phrase may run; this 12th section does, in fact, confer upon the State Legislatures a negative upon parts of this bill. And in what part of the Constitution do strict constructionists (it is they who insist upon this State-right feature) find authority for this Government to give power to the State Legislatures? If the States have this authority by their own constitutions, or by the Constitution of the United States, your law is superfluous; if they have it not, it is inoperative. But why give the States a negative upon parts only of this bill? Why not upon the whole of it? Why may they not exclude from your exchequer public as well as private deposites? There are no degrees of constitutionality. You assert your power to confer upon the exchequer authority to receive both, and yet admit that the States have the power to exclude one.

I will not affect ignorance, Mr. Speaker, of the reason which I presume will be given for this distinction—that Congress, having authority to lay and collect duties, &c., may provide a place for their deposite. But it will be recollected that this same power to lay and collect duties is one of the sources indicated in the report from which is deduced the power to provide and secure a national paper currency—the great object of the exchequer; and surely a place for the execution of this latter power is as necessary as a place for the deposite of the public money.

This section, irreconcilable as it is with the general principles of the Constitution, and in direct opposition to many of the opinions expressed in the report, was inserted in the bill, beyond all doubt, to avoid collision with "the fixed constitutional fact."

Mr. Speaker, in mere matters of expediency I would not be very tenacious of my own opinions; I would be willing to yield much to the wishes, judgments, and honest prejudices, if you please, of others. In subordinate matters, I would be unwilling, by an obstinate adherence to preconceived notions, to hazard the attainment of any great good. But when asked to surrender the authority of the Federal Government to execute its own powers—to give up that part of the Constitution which, more than any other, distinguishes it from the articles of Confederation, of which the want of this very authority was the great defect; when called upon to throw this Government back upon a miserable and imbecile dependence upon the State Legislatures; when invoked to make partition of that authority which the people conferred upon us, with those to whom they most wisely denied it,—I cannot but recollect there are other fixed constitutional facts besides the Executive veto. One of those facts is, that all legislative power under the Constitution is conferred upon Congress; which power each member is sworn to execute in accordance with the Constitution. Part of those legislative powers—those from which are claimed, and properly claimed, for this Government, the authority to provide a national paper currency—are enumerated in the report. This bill, in execution of that power, provides such a currency; this power we are sworn to execute ourselves; that oath is a perpetual interdict to the surrender of that power, no matter at whose bidding, no matter for what purpose.

This bill recognises two kinds of currency—gold and silver coin, and paper. For reasons given in the report—its cheapness and facility of remittance—the paper, it is supposed, will be more desirable, and therefore more valuable, than the coin. If this be true, the convenience which this paper currency is intended to afford the treasury will be lost. Commercial sagacity will absorb, if not the whole, the greater part of it in commercial exchanges, and leave the Government to a more cumbrous and expensive coin.

Having touched upon some of the objectionable points in the plan of an exchequer reported by the committee, permit me to call your attention to that recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury. The remarks which I have already made upon the one, are equally applicable to the same provisions of the other. As a mode of attaining the great object proposed by these bills, as a mere measure of finance and currency, the scheme of the Secretary has great advantages over that of the committee. With the latter, it authorizes the exchequer at the seat of Government, and its agencies in the States, to receive private deposites of gold and silver coin and bullion, and to issue certificates therefor; the amount on deposite at any one time never to exceed fifteen millions of dollars. For the safekeeping of the specie, and issuing the certificate, a premium not exceeding one-half per cent. may be charged. This charge to the depositor, I think, will exclude from the vaults of the exchequer the coin of individuals, so long as the banks continue to do what they always have done—receive such deposites, and issue such certificates, free of expense. The committee, in their bill, made these certificates of individual deposites receivable at the treasury in payment of all dues to the United States, while that of the Secretary excludes them. Thus discredited by the Government, they must be at a discount in market; and I leave it to the financiering skill which devised the project, to point out the collateral advantages which led to the belief that individuals would deposite gold and silver, and receive in exchange depreciated paper. These certificates, with this fatal mark of exclusion upon them, are intended as a circulation for the people; thus recognising and legalizing one of the practical results, and one of the most odious features of the sub-treasury—one currency for the Government, and another for the people. Sir, under these circumstances, there is no risk in the prediction that the anticipated deposites will never be made, and all expectations of relief from that quarter will be utterly disappointed.

In addition to this, the Secretary proposes to issue fifteen millions of dollars, in the form of treasury notes, upon a basis of five millions of specie, with a power reserved to the Secretary of the Treasury to enlarge that basis to ten millions, by creating a Government stock redeemable in twenty years. These treasury notes being authorized, it was necessary to provide some mode by which they could be put and kept in circulation. For this purpose, the officers of the exchequer are directed to make payment of all drafts upon them (at the option of the creditor) in gold and silver coin, or treasury notes; and it is declared lawful for the board of exchequer, and each of its agencies, to purchase domestic bills of exchange, under certain regulations. The said board and its agencies are also authorized to draw bills or drafts on each other, and to sell such bills or drafts at a premium not to exceed two per cent. Now, Mr. Speaker, in order to form some probable conjecture how this measure will work, as one of finance and currency, (its political bearings I shall examine hereafter,) let us look at the apparatus intended to produce these great results.

There is established in the Treasury Department, at the seat of Government, a board, to be called the exchequer of the United States, to be composed of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Treasurer of the United States, and three commissioners, to be appointed by the President, with the consent of the Senate. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to appoint all such inferior officers as, in the judgment of the board, the transaction of its business may require. The board of exchequer is also authorized to establish such agencies or offices as it may judge expedient, not exceeding two in any State or Territory; and the Secretary of the Treasury is also authorized, upon the recommendation of the board, to appoint such officers and agents as the said board may determine to be necessary for the transaction of its business. The board is also authorized to fix the compensation of such officers. The exchequer and its officers, thus organized, are declared to be the general agents of the Government of the United States for receiving, safekeeping, and disbursing the public moneys, and transferring and transmitting the same. The exchequer is also authorized to receive private deposites, as we have seen, to the amount of $15,000,000; to issue treasury notes to the amount of $15,000,000; and to purchase domestic bills of exchange, with no other limit than their ability to pay for them.

This, sir, is a concise but accurate description of the exchequer. Let us suppose it in full operation. There are, then, the board at Washington, and fifty-eight agencies distributed through the States, having in their custody and control, either on deposite or in circulation, $42,000,000, for which the Government of the United States is at all times responsible; and this sum does not include the ordinary daily accruing revenue. I would not exaggerate the number of persons necessary to the transaction of all this business. When the estimates shall come in from the Treasury for the payment of their salaries, you will find they will far exceed three hundred. Suppose them to be that number, he must have more faith in the integrity and capacity of revenue officers than I have, who has confidence in a scheme of finance dependent for its success upon finding these qualities, in an eminent degree, in so large a number of men. Sir, we have bills upon our calendar for the release of the sureties of defaulting officers, which may give us some wholesome admonitions upon this subject. It is not a very violent presumption, nor one at which I suppose the Administration or its friends will take fire, that these appointments will be made from political considerations. The removal of Jonathan Roberts is a pregnant proof of that. Officers thus appointed can scarcely be supposed to act from higher motives than those which led to their selection. The fate of Jonathan Roberts will prevent that. Political considerations, then, it may be safely assumed, will not be entirely without their influence in determining the direction of exchequer facilities, and whose bills of exchange shall be purchased. Securities of this description are not generally considered the most valuable among cautious and considerate men. When to this temptation—to look beyond the mere value of the bill—we add the consideration that these men have no pecuniary interest in the transactions they control, and that they bear no part of the loss, if loss ensue; we can scarcely, I think, avoid the conclusion, that this boasted plan is destined to as signal a failure as its equally boasted predecessors.

But, sir, if this plan be thus full of risk, as a mere matter of dollars and cents, how will you estimate its danger as a political engine? It has long been the policy of the Whigs, and it is the true policy of the country, to restrain and circumscribe Executive power. The President being the constitutional commander-in-chief of the army and navy, it has been justly deemed of the last importance to remove, as far as possible, from his control, the treasure of the nation. It has grown into a maxim of free government, that the purse and the sword should not be intrusted to the same hands. So jealous were the framers of the Constitution of this Union, that they expressly provided that no appropriation of money, to raise and support armies, should be made for a longer time than two years. Look at the immense sums of money which this bill at all times places in the hands of officers dependent upon the President for their appointment, and at every moment subject to his power of removal. Do you expect independent action from men thus situated? You will be disappointed. The control of the officer is the control of the fund. They are his officers, and, with rare exceptions, will do his bidding. We opposed the sub-treasury—I did, at least—because of this very increase of power which it conferred upon the President. In comparison with this, that fiscal agent was absolutely impotent. The sub-treasury had no authority to receive private deposites, to issue treasury notes, or to grant pecuniary favors, in shape of bills of exchange, in return for political support. In the course of the ordinary business of the Government, there would seldom have been in the treasury at one time more than five or six millions of dollars, and that at every moment liable to treasury drafts. This same amount, and under the same liabilities, will be in deposite in the exchequer, besides the private deposites and specie basis of the treasury notes; which being necessarily of a more permanent character, will be less frequently called for, and therefore more exposed to be withdrawn and squandered.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING,] feeling the force of this objection, has attempted to obviate it by saying, "You could have nothing that was to exert a useful activity without power. If you excluded power, you at once excluded action. Did you want useful action, how was it to be had without power? To refuse power was to enjoin inactivity. In any possible mode of managing the finances of such a nation as this, power was unavoidable; there must be power." Such phrases as these were never wanting to calm the fears and lull the suspicions of a jealous people; under cover of them, usurpation has ever made its sure advances. Admitting their truth as general propositions, I beg leave to say they do not meet the case, or remove the objections. That some power is necessary, was never denied; that is not the question. Does not this bill confer upon the President more power than is necessary to the accomplishment of its object? That is the true question. If so, then the power is excessive; and all will agree that it is the duty of Congress to refuse it. By the veto, the President controls the legislation of Congress; give him the exchequer, and he will control the money of the people. What other power is wanting to constitute him a despot?

Another gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. WINTHROP,] speaking of the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, complains that they seem unwilling to place any confidence in the honesty of public officers; and to show that such confidence may be safely extended to them, he disregards the numerous instances of recent defalcations in our own country, which had no doubt awakened the suspicions of the committee, and quotes Montesquieu, who says that fear is the basis of despotic governments, honor of monarchies, and virtue of republics. Does the honorable gentleman understand the great philosopher to refer to the virtue of the people, or their rulers? It is fear in the subject, and not in the king, which is the basis of despotism; and the virtue of the people, not of the rulers, is the basis of republics. The prime virtue of a republican people is an ever-wakeful jealousy of the power intrusted to the Government; and especially to place little reliance upon the integrity of treasury agents, through whose hands the public money passes; and less, if possible, upon the disinterestedness of politicians who direct its expenditure.

The chairman of the special committee [Mr. CUSHING] tells us he once thought that the exchequer would not furnish so safe a depository of the public funds as a bank of the United States; but adds, "with the ruins in our sight of the old United States Bank—with the proof of its whole capital having been squandered—it surely did not become Congress to say that such an institution was the safest place to keep the public treasure." It cannot have escaped your recollection, sir, that, at the extra session in 1841, that gentleman, with the same ruins in his eyes, and that same proof of squandered capital before him, voted for two bills chartering United States banks, for the avowed purpose of receiving the public deposites. This same idea of the insecurity of a bank of the United States is found in Mr. Forward's report, who admits, however, that it was always faithful to its engagements, and that the Government sustained no loss. I marvel that neither of these gentlemen adverted to the fact that the ruin they deplore was not of a bank chartered by Congress, but a State bank of Pennsylvania, with a capital of thirty-five millions of dollars, which, within its limited sphere of operations, it could not legitimately use in banking, and therefore ran into the wildest speculations; and that was the cause of its ruin.

This exchequer, Mr. Speaker, is, in everything but name, a Government bank. This, to be sure, is denied by its friends, because it is admitted on all hands that such an institution is full of danger to the purity of our Government and the liberties of our people.

That this exchequer will not furnish the relief anticipated from it, is almost admitted by the Secretary in his report, who says: "The exchequer can lend money to nobody; it can furnish capital to no one to begin, carry on, or uphold his business;" "all real borrowing and lending is excluded; and bills are to be taken on such time only as is necessary for ordinary notice and the usual transmission of intelligence."

For these reasons, I cannot support these plans, or either of them.

SPEECH OF MR. WOODBURY, OF NEW HAMPSHIRE.

In Senate, February 19, 1843—On the amendment to the bill as to treasury notes, proposing to fund them.

Mr. WOODBURY said that the chairman having referred to him as approving the amendment, it became necessary, in order to prevent misapprehension, to state briefly the reasons for his opinion. He did not wish to fund treasury notes when the treasury possessed the means of payment, or was likely soon to have them; or when those in power were willing to go forward wisely, and raise the necessary means within the year to discharge the expenses of the year. But the close of the session had now arrived, without a single effort, on the part of the majority, to raise those means, either by a modification of the present injudicious tariff, or by any other taxes. This had occurred in the face of a resolution, passed at the last session of the Senate, almost or quite unanimously, in these words:

"Resolved, That it is the duty of the General Government to provide an adequate revenue within the year to meet the current expenses of the year; and that any expedient, either by loan or treasury notes, to supply, in time of peace, a deficiency of revenue, especially during successive years, is unwise, and must lead to pernicious consequences."

His own principles, at all times, had been unfavorable to the issue or re-issue of treasury notes, or to a permanent loan, in time of peace, except in a temporary exigency; and when additional revenue to meet the notes, as in 1837, was soon expected; or when, as between that and 1841, all looked forward to a judicious alteration in the tariff, at an early day, suited to redeem any notes which might be outstanding. Indeed, the whole amount out at several dates during that period, was only a single million and a fraction; and at others, two millions and a fraction: while now it exceeded eleven millions; and now none of the majority proposed to raise revenue sufficient, or expressed any hopes of having revenue sufficient, for many years, to redeem them.

It is another alarming fact, that several millions of the treasury notes now out are actually due, and no means whatever are provided which the Administration intends to apply to their redemption. It is further manifest to any one who will take the trouble to examine this subject, that quite eleven millions of the eleven and a half now out will fall due within this calendar year. All that is proposed to be done by the Treasury Department is, not to apply the borrowed money to redeem them as far as it will go—though we permitted it to be borrowed for that very object—but to persevere in a system of re-issue and re-issue, without the least prospect of final payment, under the existing laws, for several years.

We had been gravely told in a high quarter, that, as the notes were on interest, they might not be presented for payment; and hence, perhaps, the department might get along without any provision whatever. But what should we think of an individual, who made no provision to pay his note or bond, when falling due, because it was on interest? What could be more negligent and fatal to credit?

At last, however, it was discovered that, in any fluctuation of the money market, the whole of the notes might be paid in for duties and lands—or payment demanded of those due; and thus the treasury be compelled again, and at once, to stop payment. Hence, the official recommendation now was to give power to re-issue other notes. This was better than nothing, but was not enough for the occasion. Mr. W. was convinced that this would be mere evasion, and shuffling off, and procrastination, without any expectation or ability soon to make final payment. It was done, likewise, at the highest rate (of six per cent.) now, though at a much lower rate formerly.

On the contrary, a permanent loan could probably be now effected at five per cent., or five and a half, and for eight or ten years only; and by authorizing these, or any better terms which can be obtained, through the adoption of this amendment, we should save interest—considering the rate now paid—and (what was much more in importance) should sustain the national faith honorably. He conceded that, for large and permanent deficiencies, a loan like that proposed in the amendment was only a choice of evils. We had to select between that, and bankruptcy or financial disgrace. But, in his view, the true course to meet such deficiencies was taxation, or a reduction of expenses so as to have prevented them.

But we had hitherto refused to reduce the expenses sufficiently; we had neglected to tax sufficiently; we had failed to get means enough, by the panaceas of giving away the land revenue for a time, and of making a high protective tariff, instead of a revenue one.

What, then, was the best measure left? It was, in his opinion, to make the loan, rather than temporize longer, and incur the danger of further discredit, protests, and insolvency, heaped on the public treasury.

The only remaining doubt about this loan must be, that some might think the condition of the treasury so flourishing as to be able to redeem these notes as they fall due, or redeem them as soon as the next year, by the current revenue. If either of these were the fact, or were highly probable, he, for one, would not prefer a permanent loan, but a further issue or re-issue of notes during another year.

But, in his view, neither of those events could be justly anticipated. Neither was pretended to be probable by the Treasury Department, or by its organs on the floor of either House of Congress; nor could any Senator expect either, who would look a moment at the real, naked condition of the treasury,—though it had been a matter of so much exultation with some gentlemen on the other side, a few days ago, in this body. In truth, so lamentable was its condition, all admit that the expenses of this calendar year would not be met without the use, for that purpose, of the millions of borrowed money on hand, which had been authorized for the different purpose of redeeming these very notes.

What, sir! boast that we are able to get along this year, in profound peace, and after all reforms, only by the help of five or six millions of borrowed money?—boast that we have been able, at last, to borrow money, though not till after abandoning the finances distributed, and reducing our expenses down to near the standard proposed by us, and violently resisted by our opponents, no longer ago than the last session?

In proof of this, he would submit two or three facts. At this late hour, Mr. W. said he would omit all unimportant details, and merely say that the whole estimated revenue of the year, including the lands, was but $2,600,000 independent of the customs. Now, compute these last at fourteen or sixteen millions, as the Secretary did last December; or at thirteen, as he has since stated; and every one can see that there will not be enough to pay either of his estimated amount of expenditures. One of them was at twenty, and the other at twenty-two millions. How, then, do he and all his friends calculate to meet the expenses of this calendar year—to say nothing now of the next half year, for which we have also made large appropriations with inadequate means? I repeat, sir, they expect it solely by the use of the borrowed money on hand the 1st of January, and that obtained since; and solely, too, by diverting it from its original destination—the redemption of these very notes, which, in part, we are thus forced to fund in the manner proposed by the amendment under consideration.

It is a little remarkable, too, that the data on which even thirteen millions from customs are computed to be likely to be received, as exhibited by a financial report in the other House, do not sustain that estimate. We may, in the end, receive such an amount, or even more. On that he offered no opinion. But the data of $3,116,370, assumed as the accruing duties of the last quarter, on its imports, had since been admitted by the Secretary to be more than half a million too high.

[Mr. EVANS asked where? He wanted to see the documents.]

Mr. W. said here they are. The first one before him was addressed to the Senate, (No. 167;) and the other is in a letter from the Treasury Department (page 10) annexed to that very financial report (No. 227) in the other House. This two million six hundred thousand—or, to give the figures from the report, $2,579,380—being quadrupled for the year, instead of the other larger sum, would show an error of between two and three millions. But the accruing duties—if the term is properly used—are the gross duties, and not the net, which is supposed in the report in the other House; and hence the net duties would be still further less, for the year, by near three millions—showing, perhaps, still another error, quite to that extent.

If the other basis of computation in that report is relied on—which is, that the dutiable imports in 1843 will be $40,000,000, and the duties on them, at 35 per cent. on the average, will yield $14,000,000—and $1,000,000 deducted from that, will give $13,000,000 net revenue. There seems to be another error also in that, approaching $2,000,000. Because the drawbacks of all kinds, and bounties, are likely to be near $2,000,000, and are not deducted; but only the sum of $1,000,000, which is not equal to the mere expenses of collection. But enough of this. Passing over all other details, it must be manifest that the $5,000,000 to $7,000,000 of borrowed money now on hand, must be diverted from the redemption of these notes, in order to defray the current expenses of the year; and hence, that the notes must be funded, or left unpaid, and to be re-issued without end.

The prospect next year is no better than this, for these reasons: To be sure, the expenses last year and this would have been much higher, if the real friends of retrenchment had not united and reduced the appropriations near $6,000,000 below what the Administration asked. It is true, also, that we have again this year cut them down $2,000,000 or $3,000,000 further below the estimates, if excesses are not run into before we adjourn. But still $18,000,000, including the interest on the debt, will probably be as low a point as will be reached this or the next year; and the customs and lands together are not likely to exceed that amount much, if any, till 1845, when several millions of the permanent debt fall due, and must be paid. In further evidence of this, Mr. W. said he held in his hand a tabular statement of the debt, showing not only its amount, old and new, permanent and temporary, but the amounts soon becoming due. He would not trouble the Senate with reading the details.

Now due	3,722,831

This differed some, but not very materially, from what had been suggested by the chairman. But it showed a load imposed on our shoulders, for this year and a few coming years, which rendered the redemption of the treasury notes hopeless, unless new taxes, or a further permanent loan, were resorted to. So much for this view of the subject.

Another view—not unimportant to advert to a moment—was, that this is not the entertainment to which we were invited at the extra session in 1841.

It was then stated by the Treasury Department that a permanent loan of twelve millions would redeem all the treasury notes then outstanding, whether issued before or since the 4th of March, 1841; pay all the expenses and additional appropriations asked for at the extra session, and all the arrears and peculiar charges growing out of large unexpended appropriations. Recollect that all these were to be covered by only twelve millions; though the Secretary wished a few more, for a convenient balance on hand, &c. Now, mark the lamentable result: the twelve millions were granted; the tariff, in several particulars, was raised in 1841 so as to give more revenue; another high tariff was given in 1842; and the appropriations asked were reduced by Congress five or six millions; and yet the contemplated new debt, instead of being confined to twelve millions, has been increased to more than double—being $25,705,772. At the same time, too, the treasury notes out in March, 1841, (of only five millions and a half,) and what had since been issued, instead of being redeemed and extinguished by the permanent loan, have been doubled in amount since March, 1841. And the whole permanent loan has been applied, or is to be applied, to other purposes. What lame and impotent management! what breach of promise!

Mr. W. said he held in his hand an exhibit of the amount of treasury notes out every month from 1837 till now; and which would show that the average aggregate before March, 1841, had been only about four millions; though, since, it had exceeded eight millions, and was now over eleven millions; and that this increase had been recommended by those who before had denounced the use of such notes, and who proposed, as one of their first steps, to redeem or fund the whole of them.

NOTES.—Average issue monthly from October, 1837, to March 4, 1841, about four and a half millions; but from March 4, 1841, to March, 1843, over eight millions—or nearly double as much.

Whole issues authorized to be put out from October, 1837, to March 4, 1841, about $25,610 000, being a period of about three and a half years; but authorized to be issued from March 4, 1841, to August 3, 1842, less than one and a half year, $16,000,000.

Mr. W. added, that it certainly became the Senate now to do, as far as might be, what ought long before to have been accomplished to redeem or fund these notes. If the majority declined to impose additional taxes to meet their expenses, and also to redeem their notes, it was prudent to do the next best thing—which was, to fund them, or borrow money to discharge them; and thus wipe away the national reproach of not paying with punctuality our honest obligations.

He was against repudiation and bankruptcy in all forms, and by all persons, corporations, or governments.

For these reasons, he had offered the amendment in the committee, and defended it, and should vote for it here.

[Mr. EVANS remarked, that Mr. W. had seemed to scold the Senate on this subject, when nearly all, he believed, were in favor of the amendment. He stated, also, that Mr. W. should not complain of the amount of treasury notes out, when he himself voted for them. He went into other observations as to the prospects of the revenue, and said that fifteen millions were likely to be received, and thus his former calculations verified.]

Mr. W. regretted that the chairman had considered his remarks as made with a view to lecture or scold at the Senate. On the contrary, they were made merely to explain why he was in favor of the amendment; and if any felt censured by them impliedly, it was probably from a consciousness of deserving it. He had witnessed, on too many occasions, the disposition, in many quarters, to misrepresent motives and objects of public men in their votes, and he intended to leave no excuse for it here. The Senate and the public should not hold him responsible as an approver of this measure without, at the same time, being apprized of the grounds on which he sanctioned it, and without his showing that, in doing this, he made no departure from his former views or acts in relation to treasury notes and the finances generally. The propriety of such caution is developed in this very debate. The responsibility for having out and keeping out so large an amount of treasury notes was attempted to be cast on him; because, under other circumstances, and under great emergencies, Mr. W. had voted for the two last treasury note bills as well as recommended the old ones.

What, sir! Taunt me as to the old ones, when so small in amount—at times but or and two millions—and when means have been given to this Administration to redeem them all, which means have been diverted to other purposes, or not a dollar of them would be now unredeemed!

Taunt me, also, with an assent to the last issue by this Administration! when it was given only after their boasted skill in making their permanent loan had failed; after their boasted skill in distributions and tariffs had left the treasury empty; after the demands on it had been protested all over the country; and the sailor, soldier, mechanic, contractor, and officer, had all been unpaid; and after a temporary relief by treasury notes seemed indispensable to rescue our national faith from still further discredit, and prevent a harsh resort, in the embarrassed state of the community, to direct taxes, excise, and stamp acts! If this was a fit topic for reproach, let it come.

Nor had the chairman been quite so infallible in his former estimates concerning the revenue as he now seemed to suppose.

The Senate must all recollect that the Secretary of the Treasury, in 1842, calculated to receive $27,000,000 gross revenue from the present tariff, including tea and coffee. This was twenty-two to twenty-three millions net revenue, including them; and nineteen without them. In this, the Secretary was sustained by his organs here—except, as more careful examination was made, some of them found that estimate might prove one or two millions too high.

[Mr. EVANS said the $27,000,000 was computed on the imports of 1840.]

Yes, sir; but the Secretary and his friends computed that the imports would, in 1843, be as high if not higher, than in 1840.

Yet, now, fifteen millions is the estimate of imposts at the highest, or thirteen at the lowest; instead of the former nineteen millions—not including tea and coffee. A change of five or six millions in estimates, in a single year, is certainly not a matter to be much boasted of for accuracy. But enough of this at so late an hour—or, Mr. W. said, that he would take pleasure in submitting further details as to the prospective condition of the treasury, and the propriety of adopting the amendment under consideration.

SPEECH OF MR. RAYNER,

OF NORTH CAROLINA.

In the House of Representatives, January 12, 1843—On the bill proposing to repeal the bankrupt law.

Mr. RAYNER said he wished to state, briefly, the reasons which would induce him to vote for the repeal of the bankrupt law, provided the bill before the House could be put in a proper shape. I voted (said Mr. R.) for the bankrupt law, at the extra session, with some misgiving; but, upon reflection, I then yielded my doubts to the strong convictions and earnest entreaties of those who, representing commercial sections of the country, urged with so much zeal the passage of the law. It was a question on which I was able to look with an unprejudiced and impartial eye. Although my own State suffered in common with every other part of the Union, from the financial and pecuniary embarrassments of the Government and the country, yet there was, perhaps, no State that suffered less—owing, in part, to the prudent and economical habits of its people, and in part to the fact that, in consequence of the natural obstructions on its eastern coast, it is less commercial in its pursuits than any other Atlantic State. It was, therefore, a question in which the people of my section of the Union felt comparatively indifferent. I felt at perfect liberty to pursue such a course as, in my judgment, might think proper, untrammelled by public opinion at home. Although I saw no pressing necessity for the passage of this law, so far as the people of my own State, and especially my own immediate constituents, were concerned; yet I could not shut my eyes to the embarrassment, insolvency, and distress that were preying on all the trading and commercial sections of the country, depressing credit, crippling the energies of industry, tying up the hands of enterprise—and all these, in their results, seriously affecting and reacting on agriculture, manufactures, and every other department of business.

When I came to look at the causes of this embarrassment and distress, I saw plainly that the sufferers were not paying the penalty of their own imprudence and folly, but that they had been brought to insolvency and impending ruin by the rash and wicked measures of financial quacks and political gamblers. When Locofoco misrule commenced, it found the country peaceful and quiet, and every department of business pursuing a successful career of prosperity and wealth. Men of business relied on the patriotic conviction, that those who administered the Government would confine themselves to their constitutional functions, and they waked from this dream to find that financial tinkering had unhinged every branch of business, and deranged all their calculations—founded, as those calculations were, on the presumption that Government would not interfere with the pursuits of the citizen. The last administration, instead of profiting by the experience of the past, continued to persevere in this ruinous and oppressive policy—making war upon credit, whilst living on credit itself; experimenting with the currency; and acting on the principle laid down by its chief, that the only business of the Federal Government was to take care of itself, regardless of its effect on the pursuits of industry. At length the crisis, so long predicted by sagacious statesmen, came. The most cautious were unable to provide against it; whilst thousands who had been instigated by the inducements of the Jackson paper-money era to embark in speculating adventures, were, owing to the reaction produced by the measures of the Van Buren specie-currency era, swept away by the sudden crash. Thousands were not only left insolvent, but unable to obtain employment to subsist, much less to pay their debts; whilst thousands of wives, who had been enjoying a life of luxury, were suddenly consigned to poverty; and thousands of children, who had been rocked in the cradle of plenty, were brought to cry for bread. Such is but a faint description of the sufferings and condition of the commercial community, when the bankrupt law was passed.

It was this state of distress, growing out of twelve years of misrule, which aroused the nation in 1840, and in a very great measure contributed to the overthrow of the self-styled Democratic party. The Whig party came into power pledged to relieve the country as far as was in their power. The people expected it at their hands. And when they came to look around them, to those who asked and required relief at their hands, they saw that they were not the misers who had hoarded their gold; they were not the wealthy capitalists who had looked with calm complacency on, and reaped a profitable harvest from, the sufferings and misfortunes of others; but they were the enterprising and industrious—those who had used their means in giving labor and employment to thousands, and in advancing the trade, the credit, and the improvements of the country in all its great leading interests—who had thus been ruthlessly and unexpectedly reduced to want. The Whigs, then, considered it not only their duty, but an injunction imposed on them by the people who had intrusted them with power, to release a suffering community from the thraldom into which they had been plunged by wicked and incompetent rulers. They found the hands of industry and enterprise tied up—not in consequence of imprudence and extravagance, but by the action of the Federal administration; and it was necessary to sever these bonds, in order to enable prosperity and improvement to pursue their onward march. They considered this indispensable to the commencement of a salutary reform. And now, for once and for all, I wish it to be distinctly understood, that we may set ourselves right on this subject:—let those who so much denounce the bankrupt law—let this House and the country recollect, that, objectionable as this law may have been, it was forced upon us by Democratic misrule. But for the weakness and corruption of the last and preceding administrations, there would have been no pressing necessity for their passing such a measure. And let those who are disposed to cast censure on it, not blame those who passed it—who, if they did err, erred from the good intention to relieve honest suffering—from a proper regard for the wants and distress of an injured people; but on those, whose misrule forced it upon us—whose mismanagement and imbecility for years left us no other alternative.

I have briefly stated the reasons which induced me, in the first instance, to yield my doubts as to the propriety of passing such a law, to the pressing emergencies of the times. I will now briefly state the reasons why I shall vote for its repeal.

I have said I voted for this law with some misgivings. I thought I saw then objections to any bankrupt law; but, on reflection, I considered these objections far outweighed by the suffering and embarrassments of the country, brought about by the mismanagement of the Government, which the Whigs had come into power pledged to reform. And since the same causes which induced the passage of the law no longer exist—at all events, much less forcibly—the question may well arise, whether a pressing necessity any longer appears for keeping it in operation? The purposes intended by its passage have, in a very great measure, been accomplished. Those who had been plunged into insolvency, from which they could never have relieved themselves, have received its benefits, or, at all events, have had an opportunity of receiving them. If they have failed to do so, it has been the result of their own imprudence; their want of caution in stretching their credit too far in these pressing and unreliable times; or of relying too incautiously on the consistency of legislation in a Government, which events should have caused them to distrust. The prudent and industrious have had time and opportunity to avail themselves of its aid. Those whose enterprise and energy were cramped and destroyed by the ruinous consequences of Federal mismanagement, are left free once more to pursue the paths of industry and wealth. The manacles have been struck from their hands, and the heavy incumbrances of debt under which they labored have been removed. The mechanic has again been sent to his shop, the sailor to his ship, the agriculturist to his field, and the merchant to his counter. The road to prosperity and happiness has been cleared of the obstructions with which Federal misrule has blocked it up; and again presents its beaten track, along which the prudent and industrious may travel, with renewed energy and dearly bought experience. The honest again have a field in which to labor, from the profits of which to pay their debts—which honor has not cancelled, although the law might have done so—debts which they never could have paid, as long as they were subject to the severity and extortion of unrelenting creditors. And many a wife and child, who saw nothing but penury and want before them, have had their sorrow changed to consolation, by the hopes and prospects of better times.

And whilst the honest and unfortunate, who were willing to surrender all, have been relieved, the dishonest and the reckless have been brought to accountability and liquidation. The creditor as well as the debtor has enjoyed its benefits; and, while the former has extorted the last cent, he has been prevented from carrying his oppression further. The law has provided a means by which the honest debtor may be enabled ultimately to pay his bond, without allowing the creditor to exact its forfeit.

If I am asked why the embarrassment and pressure which now pervade the country have not disappeared in consequence of these benefits of the bankrupt law which I have enumerated, my answer is,—that the causes of these difficulties lie much deeper than in debt and insolvency. They spring from the derangement of the currency, and the uncertain and unsettled state of the finances of the Government. These, the bankrupt law cannot remedy, although it has remedied some of the evils growing out of them. And since the unfortunate have been relieved, by the beneficial operation of the bankrupt law, from those overwhelming and unforeseen disasters resulting from Democratic tinkering with the currency and finances, a return to a safe and sound system of currency and exchanges would soon so enhance the price of property, and afford such aids to industry and business, as would soon restore the country to prosperity, and thousands to solvency, who are now unable to pay their debts. As to the pressure and embarrassments which now weigh upon the country, they never can be relieved till there is a change of measures and men. We thought we had effected that change, and that our measures were about to carry "healing on their wings" to the wounds of a bleeding country; but, in the very moment of victory, the laurel was snatched from our brows by the most shameless treachery that ever disgraced the annals of representative government. As long as we have an Executive who, in the weakness and vanity of power, filched by fraud from a confiding people, laughs at the distresses of his suffering countrymen; as long as the recognised organs of those who administer the Government come into this hall and hawk the spoils of office to the highest bidder; as long as Executive vetoes are threatened in advance, not as the means of arresting unconstitutional legislation, but of enlisting recruits, for partisan service—so long will credit and confidence continue to languish, and the country continue to groan under embarrassment and debt.

Notwithstanding the benefits which I have mentioned as having resulted from the bankrupt law, yet there are objections and evils attending it, as there are attending every finite system, every human invention. Although these objections were more than counterbalanced, at the time of the passage of the law, by the considerations I have alluded to; yet, as these considerations no longer exist—at all events, in nothing like as full force—I incline to the opinion that the inherent evils of the system, together with the state of the public mind, are such as no longer to create a necessity for its continuance. In the first place, I fear it is calculated to affect personal confidence, which, after all, is the secret of our unparalleled prosperity in this country. It is calculated to beget, and I fear is already begetting, a disregard for the sacredness of obligations; without which, no well-established system of credit can exist in any country. For it is not the compulsory process of the law which enables the young man, whose only fortune is his good name, to obtain credit with the rich; but it is the sanctity with which public opinion regards an obligation thus incurred. And any system which has a tendency to destroy this confidence, or beget a disregard for a faithful compliance with its conditions, is well calculated to lock up the coffers of the rich, to keep capital unemployed, and consequently to repress the energies of the enterprising and industrious, by depriving them of the opportunities and means of exertion. It may be said that this will affect only the imprudent and the faithless, but that those who deserve confidence and credit will still be able to obtain them. Then the question will arise, Who are to be trusted? Who can withstand the temptation, when the chances of being absolved from his obligations are so ready at hand? Who will rely upon the labor and perseverance of years to relieve him from the pressure of debts he cannot pay, when the tribunals of the country are so easy of access?

If, however, this should not be the result—if the means of obtaining credit be not thus taken away, and confidence not be destroyed, as I have supposed,—then it must be admitted that the bankrupt law will tend to the opposite extreme. It will open the door for rash speculation and heedless adventure, which will unsettle and disturb the quiet and peaceful pursuits of life. It is the sense of responsibility, the fear of irremediable ruin, that prevents most men from embarking in hazardous enterprises of trade, and compels them to pursue the slow and more certain ends of industry and economy. Take away these restraints—hold out to them the dazzling temptation of speedy wealth by hazardous speculation—offer to them the lure of such easy relief from accountability, and the penalties accompanying it,—and what will be its effect upon a people as enterprising and adventurous as ours? Men will cease laboring with their hands, and attempt to live by their wits; speculation will run riot through the land; and the sober avocations of industry be abandoned for the reckless pursuit of instant gain. Habits of idleness and extravagance will thus be contracted; the public morals become corrupted; the public mind familiarized with the idea of discharging obligations other than by the means of honest industry; and debt ultimately lose all its terrors for those who have everything to gain, and nothing to lose by it.

Another serious objection to the bankrupt law is, that it comes in conflict with, unsettles, and disturbs the various insolvent laws which the respective States of the Union have adopted for the regulation of their internal police. All the States have established the relations of debtor and creditor, in accordance with the peculiar opinions of each. This is a most important subject of legislation, which varies in every State according to the peculiar interests and pursuits of its people. It is indispensable to good government and domestic prosperity that these relations of debtor and creditor should be clearly defined, and settled on a firm and stable basis; for they are more or less interwoven with the whole system of jurisprudence in every State of the Union. Any general system, therefore, which comes in conflict with these various regulations in the respective States, must, in a measure, disturb their whole systems of internal policy; jostle against the peculiar pursuits and habits of their people; and thus be the means of perpetual annoyance and vexation. It is the policy of some of the States that a very enlarged and liberal system of credit should prevail, that every stimulus should be given to enterprise and adventure; of others, that these should be restrained within more moderate limits. Some States may deem it their policy to visit the severest penalties on a failure to discharge liabilities incurred; others may consider it the part of humanity to extend a much greater degree of lenity to the unfortunate debtor. Some States are commercial, some manufacturing, some agricultural. Experience may have proven that these various interests require different relations of debtor and creditor, in order to their successful pursuit. When we reflect that debts and liabilities in every State have been contracted with a view to the domestic policy and regulations of each, so far as the rights of the creditor and the responsibility of the debtor are concerned, it should be a most imperious case of necessity which should induce the General Government to interpose and disturb these various regulations, even temporarily, for the removal of an overwhelming evil—such an evil as did exist when the bankrupt law was passed, and which it was intended to remedy. And, owing to the causes I have mentioned, I doubt very much whether, under any circumstances, a uniform bankrupt law ever should become a permanent part of our system of national jurisprudence.

There is another reason—a strong reason, too—which will induce me to vote for the repeal of the bankrupt law. I believe that public opinion has pronounced against its further existence, and that the fact cannot be disguised. The large and commercial cities may, perhaps, still be in favor of it; but, as to the great mass of the people throughout the country, I am compelled to think that there is a decided majority against it. Of course, I can speak, of my own knowledge, only so far as the people of my own State and district are concerned; and there is, perhaps, no people whose opinions present a fairer test of the unprejudiced decision of the public mind. They cared comparatively little about the passage of the law at first, and have therefore been the better able to watch its operation with an impartial eye. And, although I feel sure the large Whig majority in my State will appreciate and sanction the motives of those who passed it; yet, since the great good contemplated has been mainly accomplished, I have as little doubt that a majority of the people of the State, and of my own constituents, wish its repeal. From the best information I can obtain, I am led to believe that the same state of feeling and opinion generally prevails in other sections of the Union. I wish to be distinctly understood on this point. I am not one of those who believe that legislation here should be swayed by the temporary impulses of popular feeling. I believe that it is the duty of the Representative to array himself against the effervescent violence of the public mind, when stimulated and excited by the reckless spirit of faction and innovation. As long as I am a Representative, I trust I shall have firmness enough to resist the demands of temporary impulse in the popular mind, when, in my deliberate judgment, I believe them to be wrong. But then, on the other hand, I do believe that the theory of our institutions is based on the principle that the wishes of the constituency, dispassionately entertained and calmly expressed, are binding on the Representative, on questions of mere expediency. Whether the popular opinion is the result of impulse, or of cool and deliberate judgment, the Representative must judge. It is enough for me to say, that I do believe the calm and reflective judgment of my constituents is against the further continuance in operation of the bankrupt law.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am not to be understood as expressing any regret for the vote which I originally gave for the passage of this law. Under similar circumstances, I should feel it my duty to do so again. I yielded to the great and urgent necessities of the country, and the sufferings of the people. Great as may have been the evils of a bankrupt law, yet I considered it called for by the extraordinary emergencies of the times. I thought it best to submit to one evil, in order to cure one still greater. Powerful and sickening as this medicine may have been, yet I thought it was called for as an extreme remedy for the distempered state of the nation.

Whilst I am willing to vote for the repeal of the bankrupt law, however, I cannot vote for the bill before the House, unless it is amended. The bill proposes to date back in its operation to the 5th of December last, so as to exclude from its benefits all those who had not then taken the inceptive measures towards taking advantage of its provisions. Now, this appears to me improper and unjust. It seems to me to be somewhat retrospective—at least negatively, if not positively. If not positively retrospective in its operation, it is so in its exclusion from the benefit of another law, which will have been in operation for months, after the period mentioned as the date of its repeal. All those who may have commenced the initiatory steps towards taking the benefit of the bankrupt law, even up to the day of its passage, will have done so under the guaranty of the Government; they may be said to have a vested right to the benefits of the law. All their arrangements, for months, may have been tending to this. All their hopes and calculations of coming relief and future comfort may have been built upon the pledges tendered by this Government in the passage of the law. Many may have been struggling, with all their energy and strength, to sustain their credit, in hopes of avoiding the necessity of resorting to the relief tendered by this law. Since the 5th of December, they may have been compelled to yield to the pressing storm, and may have just commenced measures for availing themselves of the benefits of the law. On the other hand, many an indulgent creditor may have failed, up to the 5th December, to have commenced compulsory process against their debtors, under the involuntary clause of the act, who, since then, or before the passage of the bill before the House, may have commenced process. Should these be deprived of the benefits of the bankrupt law, merely because, from a feeling of humanity, they may have extended time and indulgence to their embarrassed debtors; relying in security upon the law of the land, as tendering its benefits whenever they might be disposed to resort to it?

The retrospective operation, or rather exclusion of this bill, will operate as a punishment to the most worthy—to those who, from industry and pride, may have failed to take advantage of the voluntary portion of the bankrupt law; and those who, from feelings of kindness and forbearance towards the unfortunate, may have postponed taking advantage of the involuntary clause. The retrospective legislation is calculated to destroy all confidence in the action of the Government, and to sow the seeds of distrust and alarm throughout the land. I cannot vote for the bill before the House, unless it is amended in this particular. I question its constitutionality—I am convinced of its injustice and partiality.

Neither can I vote for the amendment which has been offered, proposing to include corporations of the respective States within its operation. I am too much of a State-rights man for that. The respective States have established corporations within their limits, for various purposes, with various powers, and subject to various restrictions. The powers and existence of the State corporations emanate from sovereign State authority; they are responsible to the same authority, to a varied extent, according to the peculiar interests and pursuits of each. The General Government has no power to establish a corporation within the limits of any State, except as a necessary means of carrying into operation a granted power. And yet, will it be pretended that it has power to destroy those created by the States; or, what is the same thing, establish rules and regulations fixing the conditions on which their existence shall continue? It is very evident, that the great anxiety for the passage of this amendment springs from a violent and furious hatred of the State banks of the country, and a pretended zeal for their destruction. And those who are most rabid in their hatred of banks, are the very men who generally make most pretension about their State-rights republicanism. Let them recollect that these State banks exist by State authority. If they are not sufficiently restricted in their charters, it is by the choice or neglect of the State authorities that chartered them; if they have violated their charters, they are responsible to State laws and State tribunals; if they are guilty of abuses, fraud, and peculation, still they are subject to their own domestic legislative restraint and to their own domestic public opinion.

Then, if the public opinion, the laws, and the institutions of the respective States, will tolerate the abuses, the suspensions, the contractions and expansions of the State banks, about which gentlemen descant so much—why should this General Government attempt to bring them to punishment? and that too, according to one uniform rule for every part of the country. The abuses of the State banks are felt most sensibly at home; there the evil is best understood, and there the remedy can best be applied. I warn gentlemen who make professions of devotion to State rights, to beware how they allow the General Government to bring within the scope of its control the institutions of the States. If it can establish the conditions on which they shall cease to exist, it may next pass regulations how they shall exist. And as it is the nature of power to advance, we may next have, not only our banks, but our colleges, our manufacturing companies, our railroad and canal corporations, brought within the scope of Federal supremacy.

It has been said, by way of taunt, during this debate, that this bankrupt law is the last of the Whig measures of the extra session, and that its repeal will give the finishing stroke to all of our labors in that eventful session. It is true that little will be left on the statute-book; but that is not the fault of the Whigs; and history must say so. They could not prevent the treachery of John Tyler; and the secret of our disasters is, that the people of the country—the Whig majority—blame us for having palmed such a man as John Tyler upon them. Yes, sir, the Whigs did commit a most grievous error in the election of John Tyler; and most grievously have they suffered for it.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] has spoken of the history of this Administration being written in a parenthesis. Not so. If there is any truth in the maxim of Shakspeare, that "the evil that men do lives after them," then it will require massy volumes to portray the profligacy and corruption of this Administration. And if the concluding part of the sentence be also true, that the "good is oft interred with their bones," then John Tyler's gravestone should bear this single inscription: "Here lies John Tyler."

I have, till very lately, indulged in the full belief that the Whig party was only undergoing a purification—that they were passing through a period of trial, from which they would emerge [illegible] regenerated, and disenthralled," ready as ever to do battle in the cause of constitutional liberty, whether fortune frowned or fortune smiled. And although I will yet have hope, still I confess I am not free from feelings of despondency. I witnessed a scene here but two days since, which I should have been glad to avoid seeing. A Representative [Mr. BOTTS] rose in his place, and, appealing to Heaven for the rectitude of his intentions, avowed his determination to discharge his duty to a violated Constitution, regardless of all personal consequences. He preferred charges against the acting President of the United States, involving the highest crimes and misdemeanors; staked his reputation upon their truth, and his ability to prove them; asked this House for the appointment of a committee, merely that he might have an opportunity of establishing his charges, and submit the result to the House. And what did we see? In a House containing a decided Whig majority of at least thirty, the proposition failed by a majority of forty-four.

If I ever saw an instance of moral sublimity, it was when my friend [Mr. BOTTS] held aloft his articles of impeachment, and, in strains of fervid eloquence, called upon the assembled Representatives of the nation to come to the rescue. I can assure my friend he needs no prouder monument to his fame—no richer legacy for his children. I am aware that many voted against the proposition because, as they avowed, they would not bestow on John Tyler so much consideration and importance. This reminds me of the reply of Barrere, in the national convention of France, to the accusation proposed by the virtuous Louvet against the bloody Robespierre: "Let us," said Barrere, "cease to waste our time on men who will fill no place in history; let us not put pigmies on pedestals; the civic crowns of Robespierre are mingled with cypress." The convention passed quietly on to "the orders of the day"—just as this House did on Tuesday—"a fatal error," says the historian, "which France had cause to lament in tears of blood." The earnest and eloquent appeals of Louvet, Barbaroux, and Lanjuinais, were unheeded; and the Girondists of that day, like the Whigs of this, reposed in listless security; while the Jacobins (to use the language of the historian) "were daily sharpening their poniards."

Much as the character of this debate ought to be regretted, for the credit of the House and the country, yet it has produced one result at which I feel pleased. It has clearly traced the lines of party demarcation in this hall. It has proven—what I have long known—that there are but two parties in this House; and that the Tyler faction—for it never deserved the name of a party—has become merged in, and thoroughly identified with, the Locofoco party; and I do hope that, amid the seething and boiling of the political caldron, of which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] spoke, the Whig party will at last be thoroughly purified, and all the froth and scum will not only be thrown upward, but tossed over the brim. I have long felt sure that the bargain had been consummated in secret; at last it has been publicly ratified on this floor. To be sure, there has been some little coyness manifested in the interchanges of affection that have been passing across the hall; but not more, I suppose, than is usual on such occasions of endearment, and far less than I think decency required. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] threatened the already-forged thunderbolts of the veto power, unless his new Democratic allies would rally under the Tyler standard. The member from Indiana [Mr. KENNEDY] said, in response, he was opposed to the Democratic majority in the next Congress forcing anything on Mr. Tyler, that was likely to meet with the veto. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WELLER] pronounced a labored eulogy on Mr. Tyler, and, it seems, felt authorized to act the part of counsellor to him, and advised him to rid himself of Messrs. Webster and Spencer as soon as possible. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. BOWNE,] who seems to be more catholic in his political feelings, declared his readiness to receive these two last, as repentant sinners, with open arms. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. PICKENS] welcomed the gentleman from Massachusetts into the Democratic ranks; said he had long seen that he (Mr. C.) had been leaning to his (Mr. P.'s) side, but that he was afraid of his colleague on the right, [Mr. ADAMS]—a very great compliment, by the way. And the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. PROFFIT,] in order to prove his approbation of this offensive and defensive alliance, poured out a torrent of abuse against that man of whom he once said, on this floor, that he "wished he could make President of the world." What a humiliating spectacle is here exhibited! A party elevated to power by the overwhelming voice of a long outraged people, with such sacrifices, such patriotic devotion, such honest enthusiasm, as never marked the progress of civil revolution before; and that, too, with the shouts, the prayers, and the blessings of thousands, who saw in it the harbinger of hope, and the prospect of a brighter day—and scarcely had we commenced the great work of reform intrusted to our hands, when he, whom we had imprudently placed in the line of promotion, by which he became invested with the Executive power, opened negotiations with our enemies; ungratefully and cruelly made war upon us; taunted us with our unfortunate condition; and, as though we were slaves with manacles on our hands, declared to us, through his confidential organs, that the great constitutional functions which we intrusted to him would be exercised for the benefit of those only who would worship at the shrine of his power. Never since the days of Judas Iscariot has there been an instance of such shameless and unblushing treason.

Mr. Speaker, although I have been amused—as every one here must have been—at the developments that have taken place during this debate; yet I cannot reflect on it seriously, without feeling the most intense pain and humiliation. The sentiments which were uttered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] fell on my ear as the foreboding of the evils that are fast clustering around the destinies of our country. When I have reflected on the probable fate which ultimately awaited our nation, I have supposed that our Government—like all those that have preceded it—would, in obedience to that principle of change and revolution with which the decree of fate seems to have stamped all human institutions, have its day of degeneracy, decline, and ruin. But I have consoled myself with the hope that this period was in the far, far distant future; and that it would not come till we and our children, and our children's children, had passed away and been forgotten. But the declarations of the gentleman from Massachusetts have aroused me to the conviction of the corrupted and vitiated state of the public mind. And can it be—must history record it—that, in the very infancy of our Republic, in the fifty-fourth year of our existence, one who is recognised as possessing the especial confidence of the Executive, boldly and recklessly came into this hall, and here, in the face of the assembled Representatives of the nation, declared that the power and patronage of this Government would be wielded for the benefit of them who would sustain those in power? The open avowal of such sentiments affords alarming proof of the corruptions of the times—of the degeneracy of this age. The distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] has compared it to the sale of the empire by the prætorian bands of Rome. It is worse than that. It was in the streets of Rome, amid the shouts and huzzas of the rabble, and not in the Senate-house, that the prætorian cohorts sold the imperial purple to him who would bid highest for its honors. And whilst mercenary swords were clothing with power the leaders of faction in the field of Mars, the flame of liberty still continued to burn in the councils of the Senate-house. It was there that the principles of freedom had been most devoutly cherished—it was there that they last expired. It was there that the precepts of Fabius and Cincinnatus, and Cato, and the Scipios, were last quoted with reverence—it was there that their virtuous and heroic actions were last forgotten. But here, in our Government—and in its infancy too—it is in the Representative hall of the nation, that Executive power and patronage, and Executive influence in the appointment of a successor, are offered as the reward of party allegiance. And that to come from Massachusetts too!—from the land of the Pilgrim Fathers!—from the classic soil of Lexington and Bunker Hill!—the first to resist tyranny—and must she bear the reproach of being the first to offer, through one of her sons, to barter away the rights for which she so gloriously suffered and bled?

These sentiments of the gentleman from Massachusetts are only the echo of what was heard a few months since in Faneuil Hall, from one whom that patriotic State so long looked on and cherished with pride and glory. How times must have changed!—how the public mind must have degenerated! That one, whose fame and character belonged to the nation, should have uttered the detestable doctrine, that the fact of there being many Whigs yet retained in office, should be a reason why that party should not denounce what they, in their hearts, believe to be the corruptions of this Administration! That the consideration of place should hush them into silence when they see public virtue scouted, and popular rights trampled into dust!—and that, too, in walls consecrated to freedom, where the spirit-stirring tones of resistance to tyranny have so often aroused the free and the brave! Would to God these sentiments could have originated with some one else than Daniel Webster!

Time once was, when every patriotic American felt proud that Daniel Webster was his countryman. His gigantic and commanding talents had endeared him to every lover of his country's glory. His noble efforts in many a trying contest had equally endeared him to every lover of constitutional freedom. What must have been the feelings of his friends—those friends who had cherished, sustained, and cheered him on in so many conflicts—when, on an occasion by which they sought to do him honor, instead of reviving their drooping spirits, and advising and encouraging them in their approaching struggle, he met them with reproaches, revilings, and bitter taunts! Sir, he is gone; and let him go! He not only abandoned us in the hour of our triumph, but he is now doing service in the ranks of those who have so often felt the force of his mighty arm. He may now, perhaps, console himself with the idea that, although he cannot save himself, yet, like Samson, he can bury beneath the ruins of our political edifice the object of his hatred. Still, if he possesses the common sympathies and feelings of our nature, the day of remorse must come. Like Themistocles, (who tarnished the escutcheon of his fame by negotiating with his former enemies,) he may, perhaps, receive his reward in some paltry office under his new allies; yet his declining years must be embittered with the recollection of the bright hopes he has withered, the afflicting evils he has brought upon his country.

What must be his reflections, on contemplating the character and progress of this debate? His name—which was once so mighty—now become a byword, and an object of jest and ridicule in this hall, which formerly echoed and re-echoed the sound of his voice! His name tossed about him with jeers and reproaches! One party mourning over his fall and his desertion, and the other rejecting his proffered alliance with scorn! Would to God, for the honor of our country, that this cup could have passed us by!

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] spoke of the "scorn and contempt" with which Mr Webster must have treated the denunciations which have been uttered against him. So far as the Whig party in this House is concerned, the gentleman has begged the question. I deny that he has been denounced and anathematized here. I call upon every one within the sound of my voice to say if Mr. Webster has not been treated with the greatest forbearance and moderation. It is with pain and regret that his present position is alluded to here by the Whigs. It has, until lately, been in the language of apology for his course, and of hope that he would yet restore himself to the confidence of long-tried and faithful friends, that his conduct has been spoken of by the Whigs in this House. It is from the other party—from those whose cause he is now aiding—that he has received denunciation most heavy. But if he has been denounced by the Whigs, would not his denunciation be prima facie evidence that he deserved it? What interest could the Whig party have in denouncing such a man? Would it not rather be their interest to preserve so strong an ally—to possess the aid and influence of his mighty mind? And after adhering to him so long, through so many eventful struggles—is it fair, is it reasonable, to suppose that his former Whig friends here should denounce him without sufficient cause? To suppose so, was to reason against all the natural springs and impulses of human action.

As to the "scorn and contempt," of which the gentleman from Kentucky spoke, that is too easy a way of answering a proposition, for one of his logical mind. Suppose we have indulged in complaints—or censures, if you please: still, can "scorn and contempt" answer the charge? Do they prove that our censures are not well founded? Can they make atonement for the wrongs we have endured? "Scorn and contempt" are the cheapest of all mental impulses; they afford evidence neither of intellect of the head, nor feeling of the heart. They are the impulses with which selfishness always regards honest and unfortunate suffering; with which heartless tyranny always looks on the complaints of the oppressed. The unfeeling miser listens with "scorn and contempt" to the cries of suffering poverty; the cruel despot feels "scorn and contempt" for the complaints of injured innocence. Domitian, no doubt, felt the same for the cries of the agonized Christians when torn to pieces by ravenous beasts; he felt "scorn and contempt" for the very prayers which, in the struggles of death, they offered to Heaven for his conversion——.

[Here Mr. RAYNER's hour expired; and he took his seat.]

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
WASHINGTON, March 2, 1842.

GENTLEMEN: I ask the favor that you will publish in the Congressional Globe or Appendix the following statement of my views in reference to the treaty concluded at Washington in 1842. When the bill carrying it into effect was reported to the House by Mr. CUSHING, it was distinctly announced that a report would subsequently be made. The Committee on Foreign Affairs determined not to make a report; and, as a member of that committee, I was deprived of an opportunity of presenting the grounds of my dissent thereto; the debate in the House being cut short, I was again deprived of a similar opportunity. I, therefore, ask an insertion in your congressional record.

Your obedient servant,
JAS. A. MERIWETHER.

Messrs. BLAIR & RIVES.

In considering the treaty concluded at Washington on the 9th of August, 1842, between the United States of America and her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, an important preliminary question arises as to the right and duty of the National Legislature to deliberate on the expediency of carrying the treaty into effect--Whether, after it has passed through all the solemn forms of ratification by both Governments, it is not the supreme law of the land, binding on the whole nation; and, as such, that the Legislature cannot refuse to co-operate in its execution, without a violation of its duty under the Constitution, and of the faith of the nation? The question increases in interest, because of the peculiar character of some of the provisions of the treaty. The constitutional power of Congress to establish a navy is invoked; ships are to be built and repaired, officers commissioned, seamen enlisted, munitions of war provided, large sums of money appropriated for a series of years, and the policy of the Government and its expenditures changed and enlarged; all of which require the sanction and action of the Legislature. The question acquires additional interest from the course of the Executive—a branch of the treaty-making power. Instead of inviting a co-operation on the part of the Legislature in the execution of the treaty, it seems to be taken for granted that no power or right belongs to that department of the Government to exercise any volition whatever. Instead of asking at the hands of the Representatives of the people the necessary appropriations to complete and support the naval force called into existence by the provisions of the treaty, and of either directly or indirectly asking the sanction of Congress thereto, the estimates for this service are presented only as the usual and ordinary objects of expenditures, and the appropriations sought professedly with no other object than to carry on the ordinary routine of governmental duty; when, if they be granted, the purpose of the Executive is manifest, to carry into effect the treaty. And when a demand is made upon the Executive for information, by a branch of the Legislature, as to the cost and probable annual of expense of a squadron, in compliance with the treaty, the answer returned is, that the squadron "is merely a part of the customary and useful employment of our vessels of war;" that it is not to be "regarded as an increase of the navy;" nor "would it be proposed to reduce the navy, if it were not necessary." The manner in which this appropriation is sought, covered up under the general estimates for "customary" expenditures; and the evident and certain design of appropriating the squadron, when commissioned and provided for, for the purpose of carrying into effect the treaty, show too clearly that the Executive regards Congress as bound to carry it into effect, irrespective of all convictions of the utter inexpediency of doing so. The fact that the treaty has been ratified, and announced under the proclamation of the President to the people of the United States, and communicated to both branches of Congress, clearly implies that he regards the concurrence of the Legislature as totally unnecessary to give any validity whatever to it. I countenance no such doctrine as this. I deny that the Congress is bound, upon terms of unconditional submission, to observe a treaty made and ratified according to the forms prescribed in the Constitution. There are cases in which it may refuse its co-operation; and those cases are to be determined by a sound discretion, in view of all the attending circumstances. If the treaty could be executed without the intervention of Congress, it might be regarded as binding upon the whole people; and hence becomes a rule of action, prescribed by the superior power, and which the inferior must obey; and assumes all the dignity and authority of any other law. But, if such intervention is necessary, then the Legislature is as free to act as the Executive, and to withhold or yield its concurrence. Without this rule of interpretation, the rights of the Legislature would be wholly sacrificed; a Representative would be forced to lay aside all judgment for himself, to follow implicitly the dictates of others, and, knowingly, to vote for a palpable violation of that Constitution which he had most solemnly sworn to support. Without this interpretation, the power of raising a navy, of enlisting an army, of naturalization, of taxation, or of regulating commerce, (all of which are vested solely in Congress,) would be transferred to the President and Senate; and the voice of the people, through their popular elections, totally lost and neglected.

Again: there is no express restraint whatever in the Constitution on the treaty-making power. A cession of a sovereign State might be made to a foreign Government; entangling and ruinous alliances formed—alliances, offensive and defensive, with the most loathful and odious people, under circumstances revolting to all honorable and Christian feelings; the particular and special powers and rights of the Representatives of the people to originate all money bills might be swept away by a treaty with a foreign Government, made and ratified by the President and Senate. Under these circumstances, would it be contended for a moment that the Legislature should not refuse its aid to carry such a treaty into effect? It may be said that such a course, by the Legislature, would be uncourteous and impolitic, and cause foreign nations to become jealous of us, when we have such a power in reserve. This would be a strong argument against the exercise of the power, unless for satisfactory causes. But such considerations have as much influence over the action of the Legislature, as they have over that of the Executive; and it is fair to presume that the former will as faithfully protect the national interest and honor as the latter, and would not be any more likely to be influenced by trivial causes. But there is one reason which should render this construction of the powers of the Legislature satisfactory to all; and that is, that this power of withholding their co-operation is the only check upon the treaty-making power which can be possessed and exercised by the people.

Shortly after the adoption of the Constitution, this material question was fully discussed and settled by the adjudication of the House of Representatives, and by the people through them. In the year 1796, upon the ratification of the treaty with Great Britain, (commonly known as Jay's treaty,) during the administration of President Washington, the following declaration of opinion was made:

Resolved, That it being declared, by the second section of the second article of the Constitution, "that the President shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur;" the House of Representatives do not claim any agency in making treaties; but that when a treaty stipulates regulations on any of the subjects submitted by the Constitution to the power of Congress, it must depend for its execution, as to such stipulations, on a law or laws to be passed by Congress; and it is the constitutional right and duty of the House of Representatives, in all such cases, to deliberate on the expediency or inexpediency of carrying such treaty into effect, and to determine and act thereon, as in their judgment may be most conducive to the public good.

This resolution was adopted by a vote of fifty-seven to thirty-five, and received the energetic support of such Republicans as Albert Gallatin, William B. Giles, Nathaniel Macon, James Madison, and other no less distinguished statesmen; and when a bill was introduced to carry this treaty into effect, the expediency of making the necessary provisions by law was carried, in Committee of the Whole, by one vote majority, and passed in the House by a majority of three votes; the history informing us that considerations of policy alone induced its passage.

I have said this much in defence of the constitutional right and duty of the National Legislature against the disrespectful and haughty assumption of the executive department. Whatever motive may have prompted such conduct, on its part, the unqualified condemnation deserves to be promptly made, that its repetition may not be attempted influenced by the impunity with which the present may have been received.

I do not propose to enter upon the consideration of those stipulations of the treaty which can be executed independent of the co-operation of the Legislature. Of that class is the one defining the boundary line between the two countries, and determining the right of soil, by each Government. Yet, as large sums of money are to be appropriated to the States of Maine and Massachusetts, which can alone be done by the Legislature, in "consideration" of the "conditions and equivalents received therefor," in adopting the treaty line of boundary, the consideration and examination of those "equivalents" properly and rightfully belong to the Representatives of the people. But, as the stipulation as to boundary is executed of itself—as the assent of those States has been yielded to that stipulation for a pecuniary consideration,—respect for the wishes of those sovereign members of our Union should induce a prompt co-operation by the Legislature in providing the means for carrying into effect so much of the treaty as provides for the payment of the sums therein specified.

What advantages, however, have resulted to our own Government from the treaty, beyond the privilege of paying out to the States of Massachusetts and Maine a sum exceeding in amount half a million of dollars—all yet remain to be discovered. England has been ready, for years, to close in with the terms now adopted; and the reason that they were not long since made the basis of negotiation, was the refusal of our own Government to recognise them. The delay has resulted in conceding to England what she desired, and not in securing to ourselves better terms. Yet I do not feel that the consideration of a "bad bargain" should influence the Legislature to withhold its co-operation from the stipulations of the 5th article, which depend exclusively for their execution, upon this department of the Government.

Other stipulations of the treaty, giving rise to questions of much greater importance than any growing out of the article referred to, do require the co-operation of the Legislature to give effect to them; and without that co-operation, they must remain wholly inoperative. The magnitude of the principles involved, and the surrender of rights by our Government, which were never before permitted to be questioned or debated—which follow upon the act of the Legislature co-operating in executing those stipulations, and the preservation of those rights, which can alone be had by its refusal of such co-operation—render the position of Congress, and more especially that of the House of Representatives, of the most vital importance to the future destiny of our country. By the terms of the 8th article of the treaty, the right of capture, detention, and search of our merchant vessels on the coast of Africa, has been ingloriously placed at the disposal of the Federal Executive, to be at his discretion surrendered to the British Crown, upon the surrender of a like privilege to the American ships over the British merchant vessels on the same coast. The establishment of a squadron of vessels, in pursuance of the terms of the treaty, perfects the surrender of that right: the refusal to make provision for such squadron, maintains our national rights upon that great question. It then becomes a subject of the deepest importance to the Representatives of the people, how far they will compromit the rights of their constituents, and tarnish the national honor, by a co-operation in the execution of so much of the treaty. The eighth article is in these words:

"Article 8th. The parties mutually stipulate, that each shall prepare, equip, and maintain in service on the coast of Africa, a sufficient and adequate squadron, or naval force of vessels, of suitable numbers and descriptions, to carry in all not less than eighty guns, to enforce, separately and respectively, the laws, rights, and obligations of each of the wo countries, for the suppression of the slave-trade; he said squadrons to be independent of each other; ut the two Governments stipulating, nevertheless, o give such orders to the officers commanding their espective forces as shall enable them most effectu- lly to act in concert and co-operation, upon mutual consultation, as exigencies may arise, for the attain- nent of the true object of this article: copies of all uch orders to be communicated by each Govern- nent to the other, respectively."

By the eleventh article of the treaty, it is provi- led: "The eighth article of this treaty shall be in orce for five years, from date of the exchange of atifications, and afterwards until one or the other arty shall signify a wish to terminate it." The eculiar phraseology of the "eighth article" ren- ers the extent of its meaning somewhat equivocal. ts terms are contradictory. It speaks of "inde- endent squadrons," designed to enforce "separately nd respectively" the laws of "each of the two coun- ries;" and yet the two Governments are to give "such orders" to the "commanding officers," to en- ble them "effectually to act in concert and co- peration," upon "consultation," as "exigencies nay arise," for the "attainment of the true object of his article;" and that "true object" is nothing more r less than the effectual suppression of the "Afri- an slave-trade." Here is the end to be attained; nd the means which are to be employed are such s will "effectually" reach it. If the capture of ur merchant vessels, their detention, visitation, nd search, are necessary, in the opinion of the wo Governments, under this treaty, by the "or- lers" of the Governments, the desecration of the na- ional flag and the prostration of the citizens' rights nay be made. The diplomatic history, as well as he pretensions of the two Governments growing ut of it, will serve to illustrate more forcibly the ffect of the stipulations complained of. In the reamble of the treaty now being considered, the ollowing declarations are to be found:

"Whereas by the treaty concluded at Ghent on he 24th December, 1814, between the United States nd his Britannic Majesty, an article was agreed to, nd inserted, of the following tenor, viz:

"'ARTICLE 10. Whereas the traffic in slaves is rreconcileable with the principles of humanity and ustice; and whereas both his Majesty and the Uni- ed States are desirous of continuing their efforts to romote its entire abolition: it is hereby agreed that oth the contracting parties shall use their best en- eavors to accomplish so desirable an object: and hereas, notwithstanding the laws which have, at arious times, been passed by the two Governments, nd the efforts made to suppress it, that criminal affic is still prosecuted and carried on: and hereas the United States of America, and her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of reat Britain and Ireland, are determined that, so ar as may be in their power, it shall be effectually olished.'"

Under the article in the treaty of Ghent, here eferred to, England has asserted the right of earch over our merchant vessels, to suppress the frican slave-trade. The American Government as denied any such right. In fulfilment of the reaty, we have made the trade piracy, and have mployed our naval force, to a great extent, in en- orcing our laws. We have maintained, that since he slave-trade was not prohibited by the laws of na- ions, and since it was made piracy by our own unicipal regulations, we could not, and would not f we could, permit a stranger, with his fleets and rmies, to aid in the execution of our own laws; hat our own officers must alone execute them; nd that they, alone, must search and detain our wn vessels; that the right of search by a stranger as a belligerent right, and would be so regarded nd treated by our Government.

In further evidence of the desire of our Govern- ent to carry into effect the treaty of Ghent, and the xecution of her own laws, our vessels of war had een instructed to cruise in company with one or nore British vessels, that American vessels might earch the ships using the American flag, and the British vessels might search those of that nation, nd of such other nations as had conceded to Eng- and the right of search. Here were the positions f the two Governments: England asserting the ight of search as the means of suppressing the lave-trade; and the United States conceding and dopting every other means but that, for the pur- ose of attaining that end. There was, then, no midway ground left between the unconditional sur- render and the unconditional denial of the right of search. But it seems that the action of the Amer- ican Government has not been satisfactory to Eng- land, in execution of the treaty. Notwithstanding the "laws which have been passed at various times," and the "efforts made to suppress it," "the slave- trade is still prosecuted;" and now the two Gov- ernments, being "determined" that it shall be "ef- fectually abolished, so far as may be in their power," have adopted the eighth article of the treaty at Washington as the means by which the "trade" shall be thus "abolished."

Then, as something more has been agreed to be done, the question is, What is it that shall be done? And if greater "efforts" are to be made, by which Government are they to be made?

Looking back to the positions of the two Govern- ments; the laws passed by each; the "efforts" made by each; and most especially the plan adopted, of vessels of each nation cruising together, that those belonging to either might be searched by the officers of their own Government; that all these efforts had failed; and the slave-trade was still prosecuted— what "effort" is there, as the ultimatum of "all in their power," that the slave-trade should be "abol- ished effectually," which could have been designed, but the concession of England's importunate and continued demand—the right of search?

If the plan of permitting and requiring the ves- sels of each country to cruise together, which had covered the length and breadth of the concession of our Government, had proved ineffectual, then it was not embraced in those means contemplated by the parties to be employed when they declared their determination to use all in "their power" to arrest the trade. If it had proved "effectual," no treaty stipulations were needed. Whether effect- ual or not, it would have been an act of supereroga- tion by both Governments, and an insult to our own, to have made it the subject of treaty nego- tiation; since our own Government had already proposed it to England, and both Governments had adopted it.

Under such circumstances, the American Sec- retary could not have entertained the proposition, when coming from another; and he must, indeed, have been lost to all sense of national honor, if he could have thought one moment of submitting the proposition to the British minister. All the facts concur in establishing, clearly, that something beyond the enforcement of the laws of each na- tion by their own vessels was designed by the treaty; and nothing but the right of search could have been meant. This is the conclusion to which every unbiassed mind must come, in respect to the power intended to be surrendered to the execu- tive discretion. Its force may be attempted to be broken, by the avowal of the substitution of the right of visitation, instead of the right of search. This is the special pleading with which the Eng- lish court has for years attempted to mislead and deceive the American Government; this is the ground on which she always justified her recent outrages upon American shipping. But there is no such distinction in the maritime law of nations, and the usage of the admiralty courts of any coun- try. If visitation is not accompanied with search, it is an empty mockery. This theory of England has been reduced to practice; and we have, in her visitation of American ships, demonstration con- clusive of what she means by the right. These visitations were followed by search of persons and papers, of vessel and cargo; and sometimes not only by a protracted detention of the vessel, but by the actual carrying her into port for adjudication. This practical illustration shows that what is meant by the right of visitation, is the right of visitation and search. It was so regarded by our Govern- ment in 1818, when Mr. Secretary Adams, in re- pelling the proposition of the British Government, said,—if the visitation was not carried out by search, "it would reduce the right itself to a power merely nominal," and the acquiescence in which "would serve rather to mark the sacrifice of a great and precious principle, than to attain the end for which it would be given up."

This question seems to have been too long set- tled, and by her own courts, to be agitated by England now. In the case of the Louis, Lord Stow- ell, in delivering judgment, said "that no author- ity can be found which gives any right of visitation or interruption over the vessels and navigation of other States on the high seas, except what the right of war gives to belligerents against neutrals."

If we concede to England the right of visita- tion alone, we concede the right of search along with it; there is nothing but a flimsy technicality separating them in name, while in practice it is entirely dissipated Then, by whatever deceptive and alluring name the powers, or rights, conferred under the eighth article of the treaty, mutually upon the two Governments, may be called—the right conferred is the mutual right of search, to be exercised under the "orders of the two Governments." The British minister advised our Government that all further pretensions to the right of search were abandoned. Whether, by this, England meant to visit our ships, irrespective of our wishes, and then shelter the outrage behind the technicality she employed, after attaining all the substantial ends to which a search would lead; or whether she designed to hold the one in terror over us until, by treaty, we should surrender the other to her, is unknown. But certain it is, that, from the correspondence between Lord Ashburton and Mr. Webster, communicated to Congress by the President, it does not appear that the British minister made any demand, or offered any negotia- tion, to our Government, upon the subject. It seems that his Government was satisfied with his own position; while that of America became the mover of the proposition. The stipulation appears to have been the free-will offering of the American Secretary to the cupidity of England. How far the fear that England might refuse the mutuality of the right, unless stipulated for, controlled the conces- sion at this time, is only a matter of conjecture.

The correspondence accompaning the treaty dis- closes and sustains the fact, that the whole of the eighth article was not only the voluntary conces- sion of the American Government, but that the right of search was the concession intended to be made to the British Government by the terms of that article.

In the year 1840, an agreement was entered into between the officers commanding the ships of each Government on the coast of Africa, providing for mutual co-operation in suppressing the slave-trade; and that co-operation being the exercise of the mu- tual right of search. This agreement was disap- proved by this Government, and there it terminated. Pending the correspondence relative to the treaty at Washington, the Secretary of State calls upon the officer who executed this agreement, for in- formation of its nature. On the 2d of May, 1842, Lieutenant Paine, in a letter to Mr. Webster, says:

"As the wish of the State Department seems to be to ascertain the nature of the agreement itself, and the action of myself thereon; and as I wish to forward this view promptly, I shall restrict myself to these points, commencing with the agreement, of which the following is a copy:

'Commander William Tucker, of her Britannic Majesty's sloop Wolverine, and senior officer on the west coast of Africa, and Lieutenant John J. Paine, commanding the United States schooner Grampus, in order to carry into execution, as far as possible, the orders and views of their respective Governments respecting the suppression of the slave-trade, hereby request each other, and agree, to detain all vessels under American colors found to be fully equipped and engaged in the slave-trade; that, if found to be American property, they shall be handed over to the United States schooner Grampus, or any other American cruiser; and that, if found to be Spanish, Portuguese, Brazilian, or English property, to any of her Britannic Majesty's cruisers employed on the west coast of Africa for the suppression of the slave-trade, so far as their re- spective laws and treaties will permit.

'Signed and exchanged at Sierra Leone this 11th March, 1840.

'JOHN S. PAINE,
'Commanding U. S. schr. Grampus.
'WM. TUCKER,
'Comman'g H. B. M. sloop Wolverine, &c.'"

Comparing this agreement with the eighth ar- ticle of the treaty, it will be seen that the terms of the former suggested the idea of those of the lat- ter; and the practice, under the agreement, leaves us no reason to doubt what was designed by the par- ties should be that under the treaty. The incorpo- ration of the principle of this agreement into the treaty the adoption of the stipulation as to the mode of "effectually" abolishing the slave-trade—shows an abandonment of the principles hitherto asserted, and the rights before maintained by our Govern- ment, and the unconditional surrender to England of her haughty demand of the right of search over our vessels. The arrogance of her demand is mit-gated only by the fact, that the exercise of the right is under municipal regulations, and not by the law of nations.

Upon the communication of this agreement to the American Government, by Lieut. Paine, Mr. Secretary Paulding replies; and, after remarking to him (Paine) that "he has delegated to that officer (British) the right to seize vessels under American colors," continues: "Such a delegation of power is not only unauthorized by your instructions, but contrary to the established and well-known principles and policy of your Government, and is, therefore, not sanctioned by the department"—"the great object of the co-operation being to obviate the difficulties of capture, growing out of assuming Portuguese, English, Spanish, or Brazilian colors when overhauled by an American, or American colors when overhauled by a British cruiser. For this purpose, you are authorized to cruise in company and in co-operation with any British vessel of war employed on the slave-coast, in pursuit of objects similar to your own." Lieut. Paine, in communicating this disapproval to the British officer on the 27th April, 1841, says: "From the above extract, you will see that the Secretary of the Navy at Washington is careful to avoid giving countenance to the practice of detaining American vessels, even though they be slavers, unless by American vessels of war. The best, if not the only means of co-operation left, would seem to be exchanging information, or cruising in company." Another proposition was made, in 1841, to re-adopt a similar agreement, which was refused by the same officer; and, in 1842, the agreement was embraced in the treaty stipulation. So far as the President and Senate could go, to give that treaty effect, they have gone. It now remains for the House of Representatives to determine whether, by an appropriation for a squadron on the African coast, they too will concur in the relinquishment of that great and inestimable principle—our absolute immunity from search. England having failed to bully France into its surrender, now seeks quietly to dupe the American Government into an acquiescence of her haughty and insolent demands. And shall the immediate representatives of the people tamely cower before this impudent pretension, or ingloriously embrace the dishonorable terms of peace which England's self-esteem has prescribed? Shall we permit the citizens of our Republic, pursuing their legitimate callings on the high seas, to be pursued by British cruisers—captured, detained, searched, and perhaps carried into port, placed in duress, injured in their business—all for the gratification of knowing that American vessels of war might be permitted to treat the British vessels in the same manner? Never. The right of search is a belligerent right, which, whenever exercised by foreign nations towards the ships of America, is a just cause of war; and it can never be surrendered by treaty stipulations, or otherwise, without dishonor and disgrace to the national character. And the highest duty which a representative of the American people owes to his country, is promptly to reject all and each proposition which seeks to give effect to a treaty surrendering so high a right.

Why the arrogant pretensions of England towards the shipping of America should be so readily and cheerfully acknowledged by our Government, is unaccountable. It is true, she has interdicted the slave-trade; but it was not until she had enriched her subjects, and filled the American colonies with slaves against their wishes. She has made the trade piracy; but it was done only to assimilate herself to the wisdom and justice of our own Government, and to follow its example.

The British nation had carried on the slave-trade for two centuries—not only to supply her own colonies, but those of France and Spain. Under the first Stuart kings of England, joint stock-companies were chartered with exclusive privileges for the trade. By the treaty of Utrecht, the British traders were entitled to the monopoly of the trade in the dominions of "his Catholic Majesty in America"—"at the rate of 4,800 negroes yearly, for the space of thirty years successively." On the accession of Charles II, upon the representation that more negroes were needed on the British plantations in America, he "publicly invited his subjects to the subscription of a new joint-stock company for receiving and carrying on the trade of Africa." In 1703, the State of Massachusetts imposed a heavy duty on the importation of slaves; in 1767, they attempted to establish a duty equivalent to prohibition, which was defeated by the council established by the Crown. The Colonial Legislatures of Pennsylvania and New Jersey attempted to interdict the trade by similar duties; but their enactments were rejected by the Crown. Virginia petitioned the Crown to remove all restraints from the governors of that colony, inhibiting their assent to laws checking the slave-trade; and so indignantly was this respectful petition treated, that no answer was given to it.

Upon the Declaration of Independence, in 1776, the American Congress passed a resolution against the purchase of slaves imported from Africa. Upon the adoption of the Federal Constitution, the importation of slaves after 1st January, 1808, was prohibited. In 1794, Congress passed a law subjecting to fine and imprisonment any American citizen who engaged in the African slave-trade; and in 1807, a law was passed carrying into effect the clause of the Constitution prohibiting the African slave-trade.

The American Government interdicted the foreign slave-trade thirteen years before Great Britain: they had made it "punishable as a crime" some years before; and made the period of non-importation into the Union four years earlier than that assigned by Great Britain for her colonies. Why, then, is it that America must yield so much to this eleventh hour convert against the African slave-trade?—that, proud and insolent as she is, her haughty and arrogant officers shall arrest our vessels on the high seas, open their hatches, muster their crew, inspect their papers, overhaul their cargo, and treat with contumely and contempt the humbly but nobly-born American, to know whether he is violating the laws of America, as a pirate and thief? Is such contumely as this to be borne?

It was not until after the peace of 1814 that this right of search was first agitated as the only effectual means of suppressing the slave-trade. In 1816, it was admitted by Lord Castlereagh that the right of search, being a belligerent right, had ceased with the war; and, if only one State resisted the right, it could not be exercised against her. In 1818, an application was made to the American Government to surrender this right by treaty. The proposition was met with signal ability, and repelled most properly, by the then Secretary of State, John Quincy Adams.

In conclusion of his reply, he says: "The search by foreign officers, even in time of war, is so obnoxious to the feelings and recollections of this country, that nothing could reconcile them to an extension of it, however qualified or restricted, in time of peace." And it is very much doubted whether, at this time, such a practice is less repulsive to the feelings and recollections of the American people. Notwithstanding the treaty of Ghent was made in 1814, yet up to this time no British statesman has ever dared to assert the exercise of the right of search upon American vessels, except in time of war; and then, as a belligerent right only. In the year 1824, a convention between England and the United States was held, which provided for the mutual right of search and visitation under a variety of restrictions and regulations; which failed to be ratified on account of causes other than those growing out of the exercise of this right. During this negotiation, no intimation was made of the right of visitation and search on the high seas, in time of peace, for any purpose independent of compact. So late as the year 1839, it was avowed by the Duke of Wellington, in the British Parliament, that, as to "searching vessels of the United States for papers, &c., there was every reason to believe that that power would decidedly resist any such attempt on our part."

No longer ago than January, 1840, the British Government—in addressing the Haytien Government upon the subject of a law passed by it in 1839, providing that any vessel, whether Haytien or otherwise, found in the act of slave-trading, should be seized and brought into a port for adjudication—held this language: "Now, Hayti has undoubtedly a full right to make such an enactment about her own citizens and ships; but her Majesty's Government apprehend that Hayti has no right to legislate for the ships and subjects or citizens of other States." "That, in time of peace, no ships belonging to one State have a right to search and detain ships sailing under the flag of, and belonging to, other States, without the permission of such States, which permission is generally signified by treaty; and, if Haytien cruisers were to stop, search, and detain merchant vessels sailing under the flag of, and belonging to, another country, even though such vessels were engaged in the slave-trade, the State to which such vessels belonged would have just grounds for demanding satisfaction and reparation from Hayti, unless such State had previously given to Hayti, by treaty, the right of search and detention." These are the positions England assumes, when she speaks in defence of her own rights against invasion. When she invades the rights of others, her positions are shaped to suit the occasion.

It was only as late as the year 1841 that England ever asserted this right, and then qualifiedly. Lord Aberdeen says: "In certain latitudes, and for a particular object, the vessels referred to are visited—not as American, but either as British vessels engaged in unlawful traffic, and carrying the flag of the United States for a criminal purpose, or as belonging to States which have ceded the right of search to Great Britain, or as piratical by laws." Upon this visitation, search, capture, and detention follow; and the vessel is carried into port for adjudication, upon the discretion of a British officer, and before a British court. If, upon trial, it proves to be an American vessel, and engaged in lawful business, she is discharged; but England having the right to search her, pays neither the expenses of detention, nor the cost of suit; and these frequently amount to as much, and more, than the vessel and cargo are worth. It is thus that the rights of our citizens are prostrated by England, and who may not see the policy she might have in view by thus acting, when she sought to monopolize the commerce of any country, and to drive our vessels from it? And the only remuneration which our Government or its citizens receive from this outrage, is the assurance that England did not visit this vessel as an American vessel!

And now, under these circumstances, with such a weight of authority to sustain us—as though the act was too shameless to bear its avowal openly by an introduction in a treaty—this important right of search has been surrendered to the power and discretion of the Executive, to be bartered away to England, under his orders, for a corresponding right from the British Government! The Government of the United States has gone further than any other nation in suppressing the African slave-trade. It was in the advance in declaring it piracy; and it has ever been a matter of desire to induce other nations to attach the punishment and odium of the crime to the act. But the United States desired to protect her citizens against the possibility of abuse; and, in doing so, it was only necessary to distinguish between piracy, as a municipal regulation, and as a crime against the laws of nations. We have ever adhered to the difference of rights created by this difference in principle. The offender against our laws is subject to be tried in our own courts alone; and the right to search our vessels on the high seas belongs to no other people on earth but the officers of our Government, and its exercise by any other must and will be regarded as the exercise of a belligerent right, and will be treated accordingly.

The utmost that the law of nations has ever warranted, or justified, was the right of public armed vessels cruising for pirates on the high seas, to the mere authority of approaching suspicious vessels for the purpose of ascertaining their real character, by any means short of actual visitation and search. If the vessel should prove to be engaged in illegal trade, under the laws of nations the search is justified; but if, on the contrary, she is engaged in lawful pursuits, the visitation is illegal, the search unjustified, and the party performs both at the hazard of the consequences. These are the grounds on which the American Government has always stood, and always been justified, even by England herself, except when her interests were different. And now the plain question presents itself—whether we shall abandon these high, and noble grounds at the insolent dictation of England? Why should we abandon them? Have our vessels been engaged in the slave-trade to such an extent that extraordinary measures have to be resorted to, to stop that piratical business? No. For many years, I am informed, no American vessel has been thus employed. Why, then, when our treaty stipulations have been observed with a religious faith—when our vessels have never been engaged in the violation of the laws of our own Government—why is it that the laws of nations are to be wholly revolutionized, and the rights of our citizens on the high seas domled under foot by the insolence of British officers? is too much the character of Americans to ear injuries while they are tolerable, than promptly o resent them when offered. England knows this, nd, by a gradual usurpation of our rights, she opes to attain all she demands; protesting that she ntends us no indignity, but all the while heaping nsult upon injury.

From the speech of Sir Robert Peel, in the British Parliament, we are plainly told what the American Government may expect. The right of visitation, he says, has not and will not be surrendered y his Government. He speaks truly when he says o; the treaty guaranties it to him. But he assumes a loftier ground than this; and tells you that e holds it by higher authority, and intends to exercise it. I suppose that England will exercise the ight just whensoever she pleases. Notwithstanding she has, time and again, said that no such right xisted, or should be exercised towards her vessels, he will assert it and exercise it towards our ships. et her do it: but the first footstep made on our essels by her officers, to carry out her asserted ight of visitation, will be with me a sufficient ause for war; and I would vote forthwith a declaration of war against her. And while I will ot vote one gun to carry out this abominable reaty, I am prepared to vote one thousand guns or the African coast, to show England that she hall not tread the deck of the most worthless vesel in our whole commercial marine.

I know it is a difficult matter to arouse the public mind against the insidious encroachments of England upon our rights. The great mass of our people are wholly unacquainted with the injuries sustained by our seafaring people, in subjecting hem to England's visitation. Already do we hear proclaimed that British officers should be permitted to visit American ships, to see that they are ot engaged in illicit trade. But apply this principle to the humblest citizen in this republic—subecting his domicil to visitation—and war would ollow forthwith. The deck of an American ship s American territory. Who dares invade it, as England proposes to do?

Were a British officer to enter the dwelling of an American citizen, and upon American territory, o demand proof of his occupation, his pursuits, nd purposes, and, upon the receipt of information wholly unsatisfactory, to proceed to search his welling, to ascertain whether he concealed stolen oods, or murderers,—where is there a man who would not step boldly forth to punish the aggression? Nay, who would not raise his voice for war against hat government which would thus insult and inure our citizens? And yet England does all this, nd more, towards our fellow-citizens on the high eas; and we tamely acquiesce in it all. Why should we be less jealous of the rights of the mariner than we are of those of the landsman? The uestion of the right of search is an abstruse one—ne little thought of, and less studied, by our people. But it should be brought to the reflections of every nind; and, when this is done, there is no fear as to he result. We are a great agricultural people. Our agriculture is rendered valuable by our commerce, which bears our cotton, wheat, and breadtuffs to every civilized nation. Our manufactures are beginning to compete successfully with hose of the British nation, in many countries.

America is England's hated and feared rival: nd now, to sweep our commerce from the seas, nd monopolize it with the vessels of her own subects, has become the great object of solicitude by he British Crown. Our vessels, wherever found, re to be visited, as a matter of right. If the American is not most obsequious to the impudent and inolent demand of the British officer, as a matter of right, his vessel is to be searched. If everything on board does not suit the notions of the officer—who enters the ship with a determination not to be suited—as a matter of right, the vessel may be seized, carried into port, and tried before a court, all as a matter of right,) and the American ruined by the burden of costs, the delays, and injuries to his business. And all this is justified, because England had the right to visit the ship, and these were the consequences of the visit. No, sir: place his right of search where the law of nations has placed it; that, if you put foot on an American deck, you do it at the hazard of the consequences; and, if we permit you to do it with impunity, it will be a matter of grace from us, and not of right on your part. Maintain your old ground, and you will preserve and protect your commerce; but yield to England what she demands, and your commerce will be destroyed: for your people will not engage in it, when almost certain ruin awaits their enterprise and industry. Eventually, we shall have to choose between a ruined commerce and a war.

A different view seems to have been taken of the character and effect of the concession made to England by the United States, by the President of the United States. In his message communicating the treaty to the Senate, he says that, by its stipulations, no change has been made in the law of nations; but that each nation is left to execute its own laws, separately and independently of the other. Conceding the construction assumed, we find, in the reasons assigned for this new arrangement, as much cause for national dishonor as would be entailed by the surrender believed, in fact, to have been made. The President says: "The treaty obligations subsisting between the two countries for the suppression of the African slave-trade, and the complaints made to this Government within the last three or four years—many of them but too well-founded—of the visitation, seizure, and detention of American vessels on that coast by British cruisers, could not but form a delicate and highly important part of the negotiations which have now been held."—"Interference with a merchant vessel by an armed cruiser, is always a delicate proceeding, apt to touch the point of national honor, as well as to affect the interests of individuals. It has been thought, therefore, expedient—not only in accordance with the treaty of Ghent, but, at the same time, as removing all pretext, on the part of others, for violating the immunities of the American flag upon the seas, as they exist and are defined by the law of nations—to enter into the articles now submitted to the Senate."

Thus it seems that the right of search, as practised by England upon our vessels, was regarded as of such great importance, as to constitute a material subject of negotiation. It was, indeed, a cause of complaint on the part of the American Government, and had, before this negotiation, been made a subject of special representation to the British Government. We have seen how it was received, and what special pleading resorted to, to justify it in the past, and to affirm and sustain its repetition in the future. And now, to avoid that repetition, (which no denial of the right, on our part, could check,) our Government formally, and for that reason, accepts the terms stipulated in the treaty. The "immunities of the American flag, as they exist and are defined by the laws of nations," being disregarded by England, we are compelled "to enter into the articles" of the treaty, to secure their recognition in the future.

Under such circumstances as those which surrounded our Government, (the full extent of which was known to us,) in what manner did it become a nation, jealous of her honor and self-respect, to act? When we recollect that the treaty of Ghent, under which our obligations arose, had been in existence more than a quarter of a century—that England, during nearly all that period, had never asserted the right which she now pretends to—that no such stipulation as the one now adopted was ever before proposed in any treaty, and that no necessity was ever presumed before to exist for its adoption,—when our Government had been insulted by England's past conduct, and was now menaced by her present attitude—there was no other alternative left to the American Government, but an unqualified refusal to listen to any terms of negotiation as to the right of search, or of any substitution for it. There was but one course which our Government could, in honor, pursue: and that was, to say to England that the right of visitation and search did not belong to her, and that she should not exercise it over our vessels. Instead of adopting this course, however, terms of compromise are adopted, by which the United States agree to maintain a squadron of not less than 80 guns, for five years, on the African coast, and longer, if neither Government object, at an annual cost of several hundred thousand dollars. This is the price we pay England for her impudent pretensions; and the tribute we render her for suspending for the time the haughty power she assumes, to reign mistress of the seas. This is what our country gains in point of honor—our vessels acquire a greater immunity, in being exempted from the visitations, searches, detentions, and insults of the British cruisers, during that time. The country would rather have paid millions for the defence of its rights, than to have contributed one cent to buy its peace from England. And after the period stipulated, should either Government recede from the further continuance of this tribute, England is remitted back to her original assumption of right, strengthened by the stipulations of this treaty. And whensoever she shall think fit, her arbitrary will will be emboldened to demand new terms, and to exact more rigorously a compliance with her haughty requisitions. The postponement of the issue promised through the homage of this tribute, is but weakening an established and indisputable right. Now is the time to settle that issue; now is the hour when England should be made to know that the rights of American merchants and seamen, on the high seas, should be respected by her. No temporizing policy should be resorted to, for a moment; no paltering with the nation's interests should be countenanced, to gain a temporary quiet. An American Congress desires to speak out boldly and decidedly as to our rights; to renounce this stipulation; to assume the grounds always before maintained by national honor; and to allow no interference from England or elsewhere.

If it were respectful to ourselves to debate the course of England, after the termination of that period, limiting the payment of our tribute, I should say that there was no guaranty, after all the money we have paid her, and all the humility we had shown to her, that we would not again have causes of complaint "of the visitation, seizure, and detention of American vessels by British cruisers." There is no assurance that we should not be compelled again to treat with her; and that, too, under circumstances of deeper humiliation than those which attended the late treaty. But I feel no disposition to entertain any such proposition. I renounce now, and at all times, the terms of submission which extort the tribute from our people; and peremptorily refuse the execution of a treaty so discreditable to the patriotism and the honor of the country. With one code of national law, under which she enforces protection to her own citizens when assailed—with another, by which she extorts the surrender of similar rights from other nations—through her diplomacy in both—she has, in her recent negotiations, left the American Government the mere creature of subserviency to her will.

Conceding to the Executive the truth of his own construction of this ill-starred treaty, that its stipulations were dictated for the purpose of "removing all pretext" on the part of England for violating the immunities of the American flag upon the seas"—yet it is from the fact, that it is a treaty stipulation to purchase our exemption from violations of the "immunities of the American flag," and that we have to bargain for the recognition of our rights, established by the laws of nations, that renders its support by the representatives of the people inconsistent with the respect due to our common country. Our Government was under no obligation to stipulate with any power on earth, how the "immunities of our flag," and our rights under the laws of nations, should be preserved. We were bound to place the honor of our nation in the keeping of no one. If the American people are unable to preserve both, let them by treaty relapse into a state of pupilage to England; if we are wanting in gallantry to defend our flag, let it be desecrated by the forbearance of England; if we are wanting in honor to execute our treaties, let England coerce their execution, by the multiplication of pledges. But, if the American people entertain yet any self-respect, let them scout a treaty which makes the defence of the one, and the execution of the other, a matter of bargain with a crowned head of Europe.

Apart from the surrender of the great principle involved, by an appropriation for the squadron on the African coast, is the extravagantly large and unnecessary expenditure which must be made to meet that provision of the treaty. For all commercial purposes, it is utterly useless and unavailing. By the report of the Secretary of the Navy made to the Senate on 30th December, 1842, there will be required for that service two sloops of the first class, and four brigs or schooners—carrying, in all, 84 guns. The cost of the vessels will be $424,242; the annual expenses of every kind in supporting the squadron, is $281,182. This squadron is to be maintained for five years, and as much longer as desirable; and until, on our part, both Houses of Congress, with the sanction of the President, shall order its discontinuance. The annual expenditures for the five years will amount to $1,406,910; which, added to the original cost of the vessels, makes an expenditure of $1,830,152. From the unhealthy character of the station, and the great exposure to disease, it is fair to presume that one-eighth of the officers, seamen, and marines on board will, either in person or their families, be made pensioners on the treasury of the Government. The number of men (including officers) to be employed on the station is 708. The commerce which this disproportionably large squadron is designed to protect, is insignificant in the extreme. From the commercial report for twelve months ending the 30th September, 1841, it appears that there was imported into the United States, from Africa, $408,955 of merchandise; during the same time, the total amount of exports to that country was $636,768—making a commerce of $1,045,723. The actual cost of the ships exceeds the whole amount of the importations; and the annual expense exceeds 25 per cent. of the whole commerce. But the amount of commerce stated includes the whole of all Africa—that on the Mediterranean (which is by far the greatest portion) as well as that on the eastern coast; and it is doubted whether that which it is designed especially to protect would amount to ten per cent. of the whole amount; and whether the annual expenses of the squadron would not more than double it in amount. That portion of the commerce on the Mediterranean is defended by a squadron now there; that on the eastern coast, by the Pacific squadron.

If similar protection was extended to our commerce elsewhere—assuming that the whole amount of that of Africa comes from the region to be covered by our navy—the annual expenses of our naval establishment would greatly exceed fifty millions of dollars. Hitherto, the Government has not found it necessary to keep upon that coast more than one or two vessels of small size. England has of late years assumed the right of searching all that were suspicious, and upon no occasion has an American ship been found engaged in the piratical slave-trade. Nor does any information reach us that any good or bad cause exists to create the belief that our citizens are preparing to engage in that trade. Why, then, has this very sudden and very large increase of expense been added to our national expenditures? Is it to furnish a fleet to aid England in detecting the villany of her own subjects, and to tax the people of the United States for the benefit of her treasury? Or has she haughtily menaced us with the continued practice of searching our vessels? and, as terms of compromise, and to "buy our peace," has our Government surrendered the right—to be cloaked, however, by its mutuality on her part, and as a consideration for the specious covering which veils it, stipulated for an annual tribute, to be furnished in vessels and men?

Viewing the provisions of the eighth article in whatever light possible, no other conviction can be arrived at, than that to give it validity by the action of the Legislature is to dishonor the American name, and to prostrate the interests and rights of American citizens.

SPEECH OF MR. GIDDINGS,

OF OHIO.

In the House of Representatives, February 13, 1843.—On his motion to reconsider the vote taken upon the final passage of the "bill for the relief of the owners of slaves lost from on board the Comet and Encomium."

The SPEAKER having announced the question—

Mr. GIDDINGS remarked that he had made the motion to reconsider the vote just taken, more for the purpose of calling the attention of the country to the character of the bill under consideration, than with the expectation of preventing its passage.

I have (said he) moved the reconsideration, more for the purpose of absolving myself from all participation in the guilt of aiding in the objects contemplated by its framers, than with the hope of saving the country, and this Congress, from becoming participators in the odium justly attached to this "execrable commerce in human beings." I will remark, that the duty which now devolves upon me has resulted from the action of other gentlemen. I have not sought it, but it has been forced upon me. I call the House and the country to witness, that neither now, nor on any former occasion, have I unnecessarily thrust this subject of slavery, or the slave-trade, upon the House. On the contrary, the war on my part has, at all times, been one of defence; it is peculiarly so at this time. The House are fully aware that "a bill for the relief of the owners of slaves on board the Comet and Encomium" was reported at an early period of the late session. It directed certain officers of this Government to institute an inquiry, and to ascertain who were the owners of the persons on board the slave ships Comet and Encomium; and having determined upon the title by which certain persons owned certain other persons, such officer was to pay over the sum of more than seven thousand dollars, obtained from the British Government by Martin Van Buren, late President of the United States, and by the late Secretary of State, John Forsyth, paid to William Selden, Treasurer, and by him placed to the credit of the Government.

Seeing a bill reported by one of the regular committees of this House, which thus plainly, upon its face, sought to encourage the slave-trade, I examined the subject, so far as to satisfy myself that the whole proceedings of the President, and our minister at the Court of St. James, had, from the commencement to their termination, been a most palpable violation of our Constitution, and of the constitutional rights of the free States, as well as a reproach upon our national character. I determined to oppose its passage to the extent of my humble ability. It came up on several days allotted to such private bills as were not objected to, and, as often as it was called, I objected to its passage; and, on being appealed to by the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, who reported it, I assured him that my objections were substantial and sincere, and that in no way could I consent to the passage of any bill for the benefit of those who deal in human flesh.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STANLY] came to my seat, and requested me to withdraw my objections, and appeared to think it unkind in me to persist in obstructing its passage. Entertaining a high opinion of his liberality and courtesy, I felt anxious to satisfy him that I was governed by no frivolous objection. I stated to him that the money had been paid to the Treasurer without authority of law, and could be safely withdrawn without any action of Congress, for it had never been the money of the nation; it was received without our sanction, and the sureties of the Treasurer were not holden for it; and that we had no legitimate control over it. He said the Treasurer would not take it from the treasury without a law for that purpose. I stated to him that I merely objected to staining our hands in the guilt of that transaction, and that no one desired to keep the money; that, as it was the price of blood, and a stain upon our national character, I was anxious to get rid of it; and suggested that the bill might be so amended as to avoid any objections on my part. He asked me to draw such an amendment, and I did so at my seat. The amendment simply authorized the Treasurer to withdraw the money from the treasury, without committing ourselves or the nation in any manner to its further disposition. I thought this would save Congress and the people from participating in the guilt and disgrace of this slave-trading transaction, and would save the discussion into which I am now most unexpectedly forced, without preparation, and under circumstances which render my efforts hopeless. The gentleman consulted with his colleagues, and agreed to the amendment, which he subsequently offered, and which was adopted on his motion; and without further objection the bill passed, and was sent to the Senate.

It will thus be seen that the form of the bill, as it then passed the House, was such as met the views of that gentleman and his friends, as well as of myself. I supposed him to act in good faith, and had not the least suspicion that he would have acted with less liberality and candor toward me, than I had manifested toward him. But for his apparent satisfaction with the amendment, I should have persisted in my objections; and should have kept the bill in committee, where it would have been fully discussed, and its merits understood. I did not then expect the bill to come here in its present form; but had I known that it would have returned in its present shape, I could not have believed that the gentleman from North Carolina would have attempted to prevent the expression of my views by springing the previous question. This management has created in me some unpleasant emotions, for it comes from a source from which I had not expected it. However, the bill was sent to the Senate, where it was amended, by striking out the whole of it, and restoring the original as it was reported to this House. This amendment of the Senate came up this morning for concurrence, and the gentleman from North Carolina obtained the floor; and, after briefly stating that the money was in the treasury, and that, from my peculiar views, I was opposed to its passage, but that no other member had objections to the bill, he called for the previous question. I appealed to him to withdraw his call, to enable me to state my objections. This he refused; and, in so doing, has forfeited that claim to courtesy which I supposed him to possess. I mean nothing disrespectful to that gentleman when I say that I had not authorized him to state to the House that I was opposed to this bill. I had never constituted him the exponent of my views.

Again, sir: If that gentleman intended to say that I was the only member who entertained objections to this bill, he has stated that which he was not authorized to say. Such is not the fact. Other gentlemen were anxious to state their objections; but his adroitness in calling the previous question has denied them the privilege, which I have saved to myself by a sort of legislative stratagem,* which, under almost any other circumstances, I would not practise. Having done this, and now being in the legitimate possession of the floor, I beg leave to say to the House that it is no part of my purpose unnecessarily to call up unpleasant feelings in the mind of any member; yet I intend to speak with perfect frankness, and I intend calling things by their right names, without circumlocution, or particular delicacy, in regard to this slave-trade.

We are called on to interpose the supreme power of the nation to aid the pecuniary views of certain individuals resident in this District and vicinity, who, in 1831, entered into a commercial speculation for the purchase, exportation, and sale of a certain other portion of the population resident here and in the surrounding country. For this purpose they chartered the ship "Comet," to sail from Alexandria to New Orleans; they then made their purchases of men, women, and children. Here, sir, in sight of the hall in which we are now sitting, and in full view of the "star-spangled banner" which floats over this edifice, consecrated to the maintenance of our national honor and human freedom, they examined the bodies, viewed the proportions, determined upon the age, and fixed the value of fathers, mothers, sisters, brothers, and children. Then came the separation. All the ties of domestic life were severed; the child torn from its parents; brothers were taken, while parents and sisters were left; the fond mother chained to the cofle, and forced from her home and hearth amid the heart-rending cries of her child; while deep agony and unutterable anguish sat upon every countenance, except those of the slave-dealers, who, without a pulsation of human sympathy, with whip in hand, forced their drove of "human chattels" on board the slave ship lying at yonder wharf, in plain view of the windows in front of our hall. I cannot say what was going on here when these unfortunate members of our common family were thrust on board that ship, and each took his last, long, lingering look at the towering dome of this Capitol—the pride and ornament of our nation. Probably some Democrat was at that moment expatiating upon the "inalienable rights of man"—upon that "largest liberty," so constantly the theme of their party; or, peradventure, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] was demonstrating to this House that Congress has no constitutional right to interfere with this slave-trade, upheld by, and carried on under, an act of Congress; and which we are called on to-day to encourage and sustain, by the passage of the bill before us, in this District. Whatever was the business here, the slaves were driven on board; the sails were unfurled; and this ship, crowded with "weeping humanity," under the guidance of her piratical master and those speculators, was wafted down the Potomac on her voyage to New Orleans.

But, sir, these "women buyers" failed to accomplish their mercenary purposes; and we are now sitting here, gravely legislating to enable them to carry out the objects of their undertaking. Yes, sir; place this subject in whatever attitude you please—throw around it whatever sophistry you can—the truth will be developed to the world, that, in the year 1843, an American Congress sat gravely legislating for the benefit of "slave-breeders" and

*Mr. GIDDINGS voted in the affirmative, on the passage of the bill, for the purpose of moving a reconsideration, which could not be done by any one voting in the minority.

"slave-dealers." Sir, let it go upon record. Let the archives of the nation bear witness, in all coming time, that two hundred and forty-two American statesmen sat in this hall, deliberating upon granting pecuniary relief to persons engaged in that traffic, which Jefferson said had "rendered us the scoff of infidel nations." But, sir, let not my name be found among the number of its advocates; let not my descendants in future years be called to blush on reading the record of this day's proceedings. Sooner, far sooner, would I have it stricken from the records of this House. Yea, sooner would I have it blotted from existence, than see it placed on record in favor of the bill before us. Yet, sir, the bill will pass, and become a law. My personal and my political friends will vote for it; not that they would knowingly and considerately aid and abet those who live and become rich upon the anguish and sufferings of mankind; but because they have not examined this subject, and have not looked into the effects and weighed the consequences resulting from the passage of this bill. The House is already committed, and are impatient at the delay occasioned by my remarks. When I shall close, the previous question, or a call to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table, will be made; and we shall be driven on to the consummation of a deed, in contemplation of which my soul shrinks back with horror. But I proceed with the statement of facts.

These hucksters in human flesh voluntarily carried their cargo beyond the line of this District, and beyond the jurisdiction of any slave State. The slaves thereby became free, in law. The moment they crossed the line of the slave States, and entered upon the high seas, that moment they were, to all intents and purposes, freemen. That moment, in the eye of the law, their shackles fell, and they stood upon the deck of that ship clothed with all the attributes of Americans and of freemen. I state this as a legal principle. It has been substantially so decided in the slave States, and in the free States, and in the courts of the United States; and it is no longer to be denied or doubted.

After these people had thus become free by the voluntary action of their owners, and when they were possessed of the same legal and moral right to take their former owners to Africa, and sell them there as slaves, as their owners had to carry them to New Orleans for that purpose, they were suddenly shipwrecked near the island of New Providence. The wreckers carried them and their former masters to Nassau, where they all landed, and each, as he had a legal and moral right to do, sought his own happiness: Here, sir, was the misfortune from which we are called on to-day to relieve these speculators—these outlaws from human sympathy. They saw their fellow-men escape from their grasp; the slaves suddenly became transformed into freemen. The owners had not the physical power to hold them in subjection, and the officers of the British Government would neither furnish bloodhounds nor slave-catchers to aid them. There they stood in mute astonishment, contemplating the immense loss they had sustained in this locomotive property—like Milton's devil looking into Paradise, from which he had been thrust. The slaves heeded not their grief or entreaties, but went their way rejoicing at being for once on free soil. Thus closed the voyage, and these dealers in the bones and sinews of their fellow-men made their way back to this city, and applied to the then President of the United States (Andrew Jackson) for the influence and efforts of the nation to help them out in their contemplated speculation in the bodies of men, women, and children. General Jackson meekly consented to become the agent of these slave-dealers, and to act the part of an agent to transact the business between these traffickers in children and the British Government. Unmindful of his high station, and of the honor of our nation, he condescended to become the solicitor of these Virginia pirates, to urge upon Great Britain the payment in dollars and cents for American freemen who had taken up their residence in the island of New Providence. Sir, Great Britain might, with the same propriety, demand of this nation a compensation for the thousands of freemen who have come from that island and taken up their residence among us. The claim, therefore, was without foundation; and the assertion of it was fraudulent, from the beginning to the end of the transaction. Sir, from the purchase of the first man of that cargo in this city, up to the presentation of the claims to this House, the proceedings have been no less than a series of violations of truth, of morality, of honor, and of the Constitution. Corruption has marked every stage of its progress, and baseness has characterized those who have aided in carrying it forward. The whole was managed by slave-breeders and slave-traders, aided by "Northern men with Southern principles."

The executive chair was then filled by a slave-holding President. He sympathized deeply with those dealers in mankind, having in early life followed that employment. He at once entered into their views, and espoused their cause. The claims of humanity, the rights of the free States, and the Federal Constitution presented but slight obstacles to his mind, when the protection of slavery was concerned. Here, sir, is the point at which the obligations of our federal compact were departed from. The President had no constitutional power to prostitute our national influence to the support of this slave-trade on the high seas. That power was never delegated to him nor to us. I deny the constitutional right of the President or of Congress to involve my constituents, or the people of my State, in the disgrace of this slave-trade. I have, on a former occasion, expressed my own views on this point; but I insist that it is time for Representatives on this floor to speak out, and to let the country understand what they think concerning this power exercised by General Jackson and Mr. Van Buren. I desire to hear from gentlemen of the North, of both parties. What say you? Has the Federal Government the constitutional right to involve the nation in a war to support this slave-trade? Have you the just right and constitutional power to compel your constituents, the independent electors of our free States, to go into battle, to shed their blood, and sacrifice their lives, in order to protect these dealers in human flesh, while they pursue their accursed vocation? Was such the design of those framers of the Constitution who spoke of this traffic with horror and execration? Is there a member on this floor, or a man in this nation, who would cast such an imputation upon Franklin, or Madison, or King, or Wilson, or Ellsworth?

Yet all will agree that if General Jackson had the constitutional right to exert the influence of this nation to support the slave-trade, it is the duty of the Government to enforce the demands of the slave-dealers on board the Enterprise, the Hermosa, and the Creole, even at the expense of our blood and treasure. No schoolboy would admit that our duty would be limited to a mere demand for reparation; that when a demand is made, our duty to the slave-dealers ceases, and the Government is to be absolved from all further notice of their interests. No, sir; such docrine would be too absurd to merit refutation by argument. If we assume the right and the power to maintain this traffic to any extent, it follows irresistibly that we should do so to all extent. If we have the right to involve the nation in the disgrace of this traffic, we have the same right to involve them in the expense of a war to maintain it. If it be our duty to disgrace ourselves and the nation by passing this bill, for the benefit of those slave-breeders and slave-dealers, it is equally our duty to demand reparation of the British Government for the fifteen thousand fugitive slaves now in the Canadian provinces, and to enforce that demand at the point of the bayonet. If those slave-breeders and slave-dealers may demand the sacrifice of Northern honor and Northern principles to aid them in this speculation, they may, with equal propriety, demand the sacrifice of Northern lives for the same purpose. And I would as soon see my constituents pierced by British bayonets, as to see them despoiled of their honor, by a servile submission to this slave-breeding influence, and made the supporters of this disgraceful slave-trade.

But, Mr. Speaker, the President, in his official character, entered upon his new duties as agent for these slave-dealers. He was under the necessity of employing an assistant to carry on the negotiation which he was about to open with the Government of Great Britain, in order "to catch the negroes," or obtain pay for them. He appointed as an assistant, resident in this city, Martin Van Buren, who had honorably defended the rights of mankind in the councils of his own State, but who now condescended to become an assistant broker in this slave-dealing concern. Although a Northern man, it became the boast of his friends that he possessed "Southern principles;" and he soon gave satisfactory evidence of his devotion to the interests of his employers. Indeed, had he been bred up in the business, he would scarcely have discovered more attachment to the interests of slave-growers and slave-traders than he manifested on that occasion. Anxiety for the success of that "execrable commerce" appears to have been uppermost in his mind, and to have superseded all other matters of mere State policy. The overshadowing importance to which he considered this matter entitled, was well expressed in his official communication to our minister at the Court of St. James, dated in 1836, in which he says: "In the present state of our diplomatic relations with the Government of his Britannic Majesty, the most immediately pressing of the matters with which the United States legation at London is now charged, is the claim of certain citizens against Great Britain for a number of slaves, the cargoes of the three vessels wrecked in the British islands in the Atlantic."

We then had a controversy with Great Britain in regard to our Northeastern boundary. In order to protect our interests there, soon after the date of this letter Congress provided, and placed at the disposal of the President, ten millions of dollars, and gave him power to raise fifty thousand troops. Yet the vast interests at stake in that quarter and in the Northwest—for the maintenance of which attempts are now making to expend millions of money—were all matters of minor consideration, when compared with these "cargoes." Mark the language of a Northern Democrat: "Cargoes" of women, "cargoes" of men, and "mixed cargoes" of humanity. This, sir, is the language of him who is considered the very paragon of Northern Democracy; of him who is now regarded by one of our great political parties as the very embodiment of orthodox Democracy; and who is destined, by the magic of his influence, to prostrate the political aspirations of the talented favorite of the slave Democrats of the South. Sir, will our Democratic friends at the North—those who, with the patriots of '76, hold that "men are created equal"—consider this language, this servile truckling to the slave-breeding interests, as a sufficient passport to the favor of this nation? Sir, I wish I could ring the question in the ears of every member of that party north of Mason and Dixon's line. I would point to this language, and repeat the interrogatory. Sir, I may be led to confide in the honor of a slave-holder; but a "servile dough-face" is too destitute of that article to obtain credit with me. Mr. Van Buren has placed the evidence of his servility conspicuously upon the records of our country. There it will remain, and will be regarded as an enduring memento of the degeneracy of the age, and of the men who then filled our public stations.

With the permission of the House, I will now call their attention to another gentleman who figured somewhat conspicuously in carrying on this negotiation. He, sir, was bred in the "Old Dominion"—where (to use the words of one of her most talented sons) "men are reared for the market, like oxen for the shambles." It was, therefore, expected that he would bring to the discharge of his duties as assistant agent, resident in London, all the zeal and devotion which subsequently characterized his efforts to subserve the interests of his employers. I refer to Andrew Stevenson, our late minister at the Court of St. James. But, sir, I speak of him, and the others, as agents for these slave merchants, for the reason that they acted as such. When thus acting without any constitutional authority, they were to be regarded in their individual characters, and not as public officers. Had they, or either of them, undertaken to act as the commission agent or broker for a band of pirates, we should not have considered them entitled to respect. Yet they possessed the same constitutional authority to do one, as they had to perform the other. They possessed as much constitutional right to involve the people of the free States in any other piratical transaction, as they had to involve us in a slave-trading negotiation.

But, sir, I have not time to go into detail, lest that hour rule—which I regard as the most salutary rule ever adopted by this House—should cut me off before I shall have fairly entered upon the subject before me. I crave the attention of the friends of Mr. Stevenson, (if he has any upon this floor,) and hope they will defend his reputation, so far as truth and justice will permit. I call the attention of the House to the following extract of an official letter of Mr. Stevenson, addressed to Lord Palmerston, dated in December, 1836, and to be found in Senate documents of 1837-'8, in which that gentleman says:

"The undersigned feels assured that it will only be necessary to refer Lord Palmerston to the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, and the laws of many of the States, to satisfy him of the existence of slavery, and that slaves are regarded and protected as property; that, by these laws, there is, in fact, no distinction in principle between property in persons and property in things; and that the Government have, more than once, in the most solemn manner, determined that slaves killed in the service of the United States, even in a state of war, were to be regarded as property, and not as persons, and the Government held responsible for their value."

It is to the last clause of this extract that I more particularly desire to call the attention of the House and of the country. In that clause, Mr. Stevenson asserts that "the Government have more than once, in the most solemn manner, determined that slaves killed in the service of the United States, even in a state of war, were to be regarded as property, and not as persons, and the Government held responsible for their value." Now, sir, I have bestowed examination and thought upon this subject, and know well what I am about to say. And, sir, with a full knowledge of the responsibility resting upon me, I say to the House and to the country, and to the British ministry, (should my remarks ever meet their eyes,) that this official declaration of Mr. Stevenson is untrue and unfounded. It was, and still is, a misrepresentation of the character of this Government—unjust and offensive to the people of the free States. That, so far from being correct, its reverse is literally true. This Government, so far from being held responsible for the value of slaves killed in the public service, in time of war, have, from its formation to this day, distinctly and uniformly refused such payment. And I say to the gentleman who made this assertion, and to his friends on this floor, that it can scarcely be supposed that he was ignorant that the contrary principle is fully sanctioned and sustained by documentary evidence, as I proved to this House a few days since. I then called the attention of the House to a report drawn up by my respected predecessor, (the Hon. Elisha Whittlesey,) chairman of the Committee of Claims, made to this House in 1831. The report was made upon the memorial of Francis Sarche, who owned a slave, a horse, and cart, all which were pressed into the public service at New Orleans on the day of the great battle near that city. The horse and slave were killed, and the cart was destroyed by cannon shot, and Sarche applied to Congress for compensation. The Committee of Claims, composed of both Southern and Northern members, reported unanimously against paying for the slave, and in favor of paying for the horse and cart. The committee, in their report, say that they had examined the records of the Register of the Treasury, and found that slaves had never been paid for by this Government, either in the revolutionary war, or since that period. The report also refers to several instances in which attempts had been made to pass a law allowing indemnity for slaves killed in the public service; all which had failed. I then stated that the records of the Committee of Claims showed distinctly, that, since the year 1794, (the date of their earliest record,) all such applications, referred to that committee, had been rejected without exception. It is not a little remarkable, that Mr. Stevenson, as I understand, filled the office of Speaker at the time when this report of Mr. Whittlesey was made. I am not informed of the time he served in this hall, but it was many years; and I hesitate not to say that it is a most extraordinary fact, that the report to which I have alluded, and this practice of Government, should have escaped his notice; but it is still more wonderful that he should have asserted the existence of a practice diametrically opposed to the uniform action of this body at the very time when he officiated as its presiding officer.

I return to the prosecution of this negotiation. These misrepresentations were pressed upon the consideration of the British ministry. They were not familiar with the distinctions between our national and State Governments, as was well remarked the other day by the venerable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Adams.] Mr. Stevenson was the representative of this Government, and Lord Palmerston had a right to expect all matters of fact to be truly stated—particularly so far as the regulations and the action of our Government were concerned. Relying upon these representations; and believing this to be a Government dedicated to the support of slavery instead of liberty; and impressed with the full conviction that, by the laws of Congress, slavery upon the high seas, on board of American vessels, was allowed and protected, and that these persons were in truth slaves, instead of freemen, when they entered the port of Nassau,—the British ministry agreed to deal with us as they do with semi-barbarous nations, and to pay for these people a ransom of twenty-five thousand pounds sterling. Before the money was obtained, Mr. Van Buren was installed President of the United States; yet he continued to act as the agent of these slave-dealers—for such he evidently considered himself. The money was not paid into the treasury, nor was Congress consulted as to the disposition of the funds; it was kept in the custody of the Executive, who paid it out as his judgment dictated. But to whom it was paid, or how much was paid to each individual, I believe we have not the means of determining—no report having been made to either branch of Congress, except a report of the amount of moneys paid from the treasury as expenses incurred in transacting the business for these slave-dealers. This amount was charged to the contingent fund of the State Department, and, in that shape, came before the House of Representatives. This money came from the pockets of our constituents, and was paid directly for the benefit of these wholesale and retail venders of humanity. I attempted to make some remarks on that subject; but, as it was then held to be a subject on which Congress had no power to act, I was cut short in the expression of my views, according to the most approved practice under our congressional gag-rules.

But to proceed with the facts: When Mr. Van Buren and his cabinet were about to retire from office, the Secretary of State (not of the Treasury) had in his possession some seven thousand dollars of the money thus extorted by fraud and misrepresentation from the British Government. Mr. Van Buren, not having fully completed the business in which he had been so long engaged as the representative of slave merchants, bequeathed to William Selden, Treasurer of the United States, the trust of closing the transaction. The money was paid to him, and a receipt taken. This was done without any authority of law whatever; and the Treasurer might return it to the slave-owners by virtue of the same authority as that by which he had received it. The veriest tyro in law will at once see that it is not in the power of any man who pleases to charge the Government with moneys, by making a deposite with the Treasurer, unless it be authorized by law; no such law existed in this case, and the only legal effect was to make the Treasurer liable, in his individual capacity, as trustee of the persons who possess the real interest in the money. Now, I think it perfectly clear, that no action whatever of Congress was necessary to authorize the withdrawal of this money from the treasury. In contemplation of law, it had never been there; but was in the private custody of Mr. Selden. Yet we are called on now to close up this slave-dealing agency by a solemn act of Congress; thereby making ourselves and constituents participants in the fraud, the moral turpitude, and the crime that have characterized this transaction, from the purchase of these cargoes up to the time of paying the money to Mr. Selden. They will not be satisfied with the money, but insist that we shall share in the disgrace with them. They remind me of a drunkard who lay wallowing in the mud and filth of a gutter, when a friend, who was passing by, offered to pull him out; he rejected this offer, but insisted that his friend should come and lie down with him. If my friends show themselves willing to go and lie down with these slave breeders, and share in the moral filth and corruption of this slave-trade, I may admire their kindness, but I cannot approve their taste.

I had like to have omitted all notice of the loss of slaves on board the Encomium. That, too, was a slave ship, regularly fitted out from the city of Charleston, South Carolina—a city which, at this time, is enjoying as profitable a commerce in mankind as any other on this side of the Atlantic. Indeed, I believe it already equals many of the refined cities of Africa in the extent of its slave-trade. Should we pass this bill, and continue to pass bills hereafter, for the benefit of the slave merchants of that city, and at the same time hang all who engage in that business upon the African coast, Charleston may, at some future day, rival even Timbuctoo in the extent and splendor of its slave-markets and other embellishments. This vessel, I believe, was fitted out in the year eighteen hundred and thirty-three; she, too, was lost, and the slaves escaped in the same manner as those on board the Comet. The owners applied to the President, who espoused their cause also. Their demand was pressed, and the money obtained in the same way, and at the same time, as the indemnity for those on board the Comet.

For many years the people of the free States have endeavored to relieve the nation from the deep odium resting upon it by reason of this slave-trade on the high seas. For that purpose they have sent to us their petitions, couched in the most respectful language, asking that it may be prohibited, under suitable penalties. And what treatment have these freemen—these supporters of our national character—met in this hall? Why, sir, they have been assailed with almost every opprobrious epithet which our language could supply. Their petitions have been scouted from our presence without being read, or heard, or even received at the hands of their Representatives. I myself have presented the requests of thousands of our most worthy citizens—of our philanthropists, our divines, our jurists, and statesmen—invoking the action of this body in regard to this slave-trade upon the high seas, and to save them and the nation from the disgrace which will be fastened upon them by such measures as that now before us. But, sir, if I happened to cast my eye upon the petition, or assumed the appearance of reading it, cries of "order, order, order," would be shouted from the mouths of scores of slave-breeders and overseers; while a stentorian voice on my right, rising at least an octave above all others, would call on the Speaker "to enforce the 21st rule."

Sir, what magic wand has been waved over us, that we now sit so quietly deliberating upon this bill to encourage the slave-trade; or, rather, why do we now pass this bill without deliberation? Shall we turn round at the bidding of this slave-breeding influence, and quietly submit to the passage of a bill to aid and support the slave-trade? Sir, I feel humbled, deeply humbled, when I cast my eyes around this hall, and see Representatives of the free States sitting in mute silence, and aiding, by their vote, the passage of a bill shamelessly bearing on its title the character of a bill for the relief of slave-traders. What power has thus miraculously silenced the voice of Northern freedom and Northern honor? What spell has now palsied the arms which should defend the rights and interests of the free States? It is the previous question, forced upon us by Southern members and their Northern allies. Shall we now submit to the bidding of this slaveholding influence, and meanly assist in carrying out this attempt to involve ourselves and our constituents in the disgrace of the slave-trade? Wherewith shall we humble ourselves before those who claim this control over us? Where shall we find sackcloth with which to cover our bodies, or ashes to cast upon our heads, when, with downcast eyes and trembling voices, we give a faint response in favor of these slave-growers, and to the disgrace of those whom we represent? Sir, the trembling slave, who dares not look up in the presence of his tyrant master, has some excuse for his degradation; but I can find no justification whatever for Northern men—the Representatives of freemen—who thus tamely surrender the rights and the honor of their constituents, and become the willing instruments for carrying on and sustaining this detestable commerce in slaves.

Mr. Speaker, I have a curiosity to witness the response of members to the questions which will soon be propounded, and see how many gentlemen on this floor will now vote in favor of this bill, who, for years, have regularly voted to gag their own constituents upon this identical subject, on which they are now called to act in favor of slave-breeders and slave-dealers. If I were to dictate a subject for the pencil, it should be the one on which I am now commenting. I would select a Northern Democrat, holding a gag in the mouth of his constituent with one hand, while the other is employed to examine his pockets for money to pay the expenses of this slave agency; at the same time most solemnly saying to his constituent, "you have nothing to do with the slave trade;" "you have no right to interfere with the matter."

I regret being forced into these remarks. I have made every effort to escape from so doing which duty and independence would permit; but, notwithstanding my exertions for that purpose, I have been driven so to it; and I trust that gentlemen will excuse me if I speak frankly. The subject of slavery, or of the slave-trade, never ought to have been mentioned in this hall. Accursed be the memory of him who first profaned this temple of freedom with the discussion of slavery and the slave-trade. Let the execrations of posterity rest upon those who involved the National Government in these subjects, by trampling on the Constitution and constitutional rights of the free States. But we have become involved in these questions; and it shall be my object now, and at all times, to correct the error into which we have fallen. I will use my utmost exertions to banish it from our deliberations—to erase it from our records—to separate the people of the free States and this Government from it—and to place an impassable gulf between our people of the free States and an institution which we detest. It was this desire which led me to consent to the arrangement by which these persons might have obtained this money, without involving us in their guilt and disgrace.

Yet, sir, this bill is thrust upon us; not, however, with the intention of discussing it, but for the purpose of forcing us to pass it without discussion, and without investigating its merits. We are asked to sustain it without examination; and if we refuse to do that, it is to be forced upon us by means of the previous question. This want of examination, and consequent ignorance of the bill, is one reason why I cannot support it; but I have many other cogent reasons for opposing its passage.

1st. Its passage is entirely unnecessary to enable the claimants to obtain the money, if it belongs to them.

2d. Its passage would be a palpable violation of the Constitution.

3d. Respect for ourselves, and for the honor of the free States, forbids its passage.

4th. Its passage is entirely opposed to the principle so strongly urged and maintained in this hall for the last six years, "that this House has no right to act on this subject."

Aside from these, I have some objections to the passage of this bill, which apply to me personally. It is now less than eleven months since I introduced to the consideration of gentlemen here certain resolutions, setting forth my views of the constitutional right of the people of the free States to be exempt from the expense, the disgrace, and the guilt of this slave-trade. They expressed my solemn belief in regard to that subject; and I am not aware that any member here has, to this day, been found willing to deny their correctness. But, sir, this assertion of the rights of the people of Ohio, and of the free States, did not suit the views of certain "natural allies" of the slave-breeding Democracy of the South. They appear to have sounded peculiarly harsh in the ear of my colleague from the Butler district. His Democratic principles appeared to be severely shocked at the thought of our people being exempt from this business of slave-breeding and slave-trading. Yes, sir, such was his horror at the bare proposition of such a separation, that he felt it his duty immediately to introduce a resolution of censure upon me for so unpatriotic an act. Nor was that all; he went further, and demanded the previous question, in order to prevent me from being heard in my defence; fearing, I presume, that I might be guilty of uttering irreverent expressions concerning this "delicate subject," and thereby call down upon myself further punishment. I would not be understood as imputing any unkind motives to my colleague; no, sir, I am bound to say that I think he was guided by his best judgment. Well, sir, you, with an impartiality which I feel bound to say has characterized the discharge of the arduous duties of Speaker during the present Congress, decided that the previous question would not deprive me of making a defence, nor others of the right of making a defence for me, as it was a question of privilege.

To this decision my friend, the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, took exception; and appealed to the House, who sustained his appeal. I impute to that gentleman no personal unkindness, but presume he did it to prevent the waste of time, and consequent delay of the public business.

Mr. FILLMORE stated, that at the time he took the appeal, he did not anticipate the passage of the resolution of censure; that he did it merely to prevent the delay of public business, and not from any feeling of unkindness, or to favor the resolution.

Mr. GIDDINGS resumed. I had no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that such was the fact; and I have now alluded to the appeal more for the purpose of enabling that gentleman to set himself right before the country, than from any considerations personal to myself. But, Mr. Speaker, these resolutions—drawing the line of demarcation between this slave-trade and the people of the free States, appear to have met with but little favor in the mind of my experienced political friend over the way, from Vermont, [Mr. EVERETT.] He, sir, is a leading member of that party with whom I have been proud to act; but the mere introduction of these resolutions was characterized by him as a "firebrand course," which he informed the country he looked upon "with abhorrence." The subject is now introduced by those who act in favor of the slave-trade; but I have heard nothing of that gentleman's "abhorrence." It is pressed through the House with as much indecent haste as was the resolution of censure; but I have heard nothing from that gentleman in regard to this "firebrand course." There is an old and common saying, that "circumstances alter cases."

Another gentleman, representing in part the old Bay State, which has ever been forward in the cause of liberty and patriotism—the gentleman at my right, [Mr. CUSHING,] who was bred almost in sight of "Faneuil Hall," designated as the "cradle of liberty;"—the resolutions proved unacceptable to him; and I must do him the justice to say that he has, so far as I know, been a consistent advocate of this slave-trade. Indeed, I am not aware of a single instance, since I have been a member here, when that gentleman has spoken on the subject, in which he has failed to advocate the interests of that commerce. His sense of propriety was so greatly shocked at the doctrine contained in my resolutions, that he unhesitatingly pronounced them "an approximation to treason;" and, from his acknowledged consistency on this subject, I entertain no doubt that he will now lend his aid and influence to sustain the interests to which he has exhibited so much attachment. I should have been pleased to pass over this portion of the political history of our legislative action concerning the slave-trade, but, having been pressed into the consideration of it, I could not, in duty to myself, omit some slight allusion to matters that transpired at the time when I last had the honor of calling public attention to it; and I apprehend that no gentleman will think them calculated to make a very favorable impression upon my own mind in regard to the bill under consideration.

It will be recollected that, on a recent occasion, the member from Georgia, in front of the Speaker, alluded to this vote of censure in terms not very courteous.

[Mr. BLACK interrupted Mr. GIDDINGS, and said: "I wish to know if the gentleman from Ohio intends to allude to my remarks on a former occasion? If he does, I shall surely call him to order."

Mr. GIDDINGS. When that question shall come up in parliamentary form, I will answer it.

The SPEAKER said he should endeavor to call the gentleman from Ohio to order, if he wandered from the question before the House.

Mr. BLACK sat down, and Mr. GIDDINGS resumed.]

That gentleman remarked that this House, by its vote of censure, had "stripped me of the influence which I had once possessed."

When I returned to this hall, and resumed my official duties, in May last, I determined never to allude, in a public manner, to the transaction to which the gentleman from Georgia referred. The matter had gone to the people. With them I was willing it should rest. I could not add to its importance; and I was unwilling to detract from the salutary consequences which I believed would result from such an outrage upon the representative character. The record of that transaction is fully made up; and I shall attempt to make no alteration or interlineations: nor did I expect that any member who had voted for the censure would desire to drag the subject again before the country. I was willing to leave it where the votes of my constituents had placed it. I will also take this occasion to say, that I feel no heartburnings towards those who sustained the resolution of my colleague. The people of my district have so fully and so triumphantly repelled the injury offered to themselves and to me, that it would be doing injustice to them for me to add one word to the judgment which they have given of the transaction. To many of those who voted to censure me, I shall bear with me, to private life, recollections of friendship and respect; and to them I would not say a word which should call up an unpleasant thought of what is past. But to the gentleman from Georgia I will say: Sir, I hold my seat here by virtue of the sovereign will and pleasure of ninety thousand free people of the gallant State of Ohio. My commission comes from them, and not from the member from Georgia, nor from the members of this House. Those freemen have conferred on me whatever political influence I possess; and no slave breeder or overseer, nor the representative of slaves, has the moral power to disrobe me of it. To those electors of the "banner district" I shall soon resign my influence, untainted and unaffected by the foul breath of slaveholding or slave dealing Democracy. Whether this House has stripped me of my influence, or my constituents have stripped this House of its influence on this subject, is not for me or the member from Georgia to say: the country will determine that point; and I am willing to await their verdict. These are circumstances, however, which conduce to my personal opposition to this bill: they are matters that cannot apply with equal force to other members.

A due regard to consistency in legislation forbids the passage of this bill. In our sovereign capacity as a National Legislature, we have declared the crime of slave-trading PIRACY, and have affixed to it the highest penalty known to human laws. We have declared such as commit this most execrable of all crimes unfit to associate with human beings; and we hang them without mercy. The operation of this law is confined, however, to the eastern portion of the Atlantic, while the offences of these applicants were committed upon the western part of that ocean. To-day we are called on to pass a law for the relief of these persons; while we hang, without discrimination, all who pursue the same business a few degrees of longitude further east. I am in favor of dealing out justice with an even hand. I would give these applicants the "same relief" that we grant to those who follow the same business in a different longitude. I would exhibit no more regard for the honor of Africa, than I would for that of our own nation. It is, however, a fact, that if a man goes from this city to Africa, and engages in the slave-trade, the whole world considers him worthy of immediate death; but if he remain here, and buy and export our own people, who have been born and bred with us—whose attachments are formed here, and whose minds are enlightened and christianized—in whose veins "flow the best blood of Virginia;"—why, sir, for this outrage upon humanity we are called to pass laws for his pecuniary relief! Our people of the free States are taxed to pay us and our officers while we are engaged here in legislating for their benefit. To morrow, perhaps, we shall be called to tax them to sustain a fleet on the coast of Africa, in order to suppress the slave-trade. Will gentlemen who vote to encourage this trade to-day, face to the right-about to-morrow, and vote millions of the people's money to suppress it? Are gentlemen prepared to vote one way to-day, and directly the contrary to-morrow? We are now using the money of the people of the free States to encourage the slave trade; and will gentlemen appropriate the money of our people to-morrow to suppress it? Are we under such perfect drill, that we face to the right, to the left, or to the right-about, at the bidding of the slaveholding influence? How long shall Northern men continue to march and countermarch at the bidding of this slave-breeding power? Sir, we send our fleets to Africa, at vast expense, to prevent the importation of slaves. We are to expend at least a million of dollars annually, to give a monopoly of this "execrable commerce" to the slave-breeding States; while their Representatives here violently oppose the protection of all other manufactures. This high Virginia tariff is not only to be protected, at our expense, from all foreign competition; but we are to go still further, and make the nation insurers to those who engage in the exportation of this "chattelized population." I am unwilling to involve myself in these inconsistencies, absurdities, and contradictions.

The bill directs the Treasurer to pay this money to the owners of these persons. What is to be the evidence of title by which one man owns another? The proposition is an absurdity too palpable to be placed in our statute-book. The title, and the only title, which one man ever held to another, is that of brute force. It is the title by which the robber claims your purse; the same title by which the pirate claims his captured ship and cargo. It is, however, a title which we, as a nation, do not recognise. It is one which the people of the free States repudiate. It is one to which I will not give even a silent or tacit consent, by instituting such an inquiry.

But the bill goes further, and directs the Treasurer to pay to the owners of each slave "such sum as he is entitled to receive." By this form of expression, I suppose it was intended to give to each the value of the person claimed. How will you estimate the value of a man? Does it depend upon his complexion? for, sir, there are all grades of color in this market. Or which is deemed the most valuable—black, or white, or a mixture of both? Or shall our officer be governed by the genealogy of the slave, in estimating his value? If he have descended, in the paternal line, from one of the best families in the "Old Dominion," shall he be deemed of greater value than if he were of pure African blood? Does such mixture improve or deteriorate the value of a man? These, sir, are all of them "delicate questions," which I should like to hear answered by some of the friends of the bill before I can vote for it. Again: some may desire to know whether intelligence is to fix the value. Is a man who reads and writes, and possesses better information than his master, or than masters generally possess, of more value than one who is stupid, ignorant, and incapable of instructing his owner? And, sir, others may wish to know what the political faith of a man is, before they fix his value. They will inquire whether he be a Whig or a Democrat; or, particularly, whether "he goes the Liberty party." And my friend over here in "the stall," [Mr. SNYDER of Pa.,] would inquire whether he be of pure Dutch descent, or whether he has a "sprinkling" of the Yankee in his veins. These are all difficulties which present themselves to my mind, in making up the estimate of a man's value as property. They may, to be sure, appear of small importance to a grower of slaves—one who is familiar with matters of the kind; but I am unwilling, by legislation, to throw them upon an officer of Government, or to bring the reproach of such an inquiry upon our nation. And I cannot, therefore, vote for the bill under consideration.

But, Mr. Speaker, it is said that we hold this money as trustee for the owners of these slaves, and are therefore bound to execute the trust. I deny the position. We are not the trustee of these slave breeders; no individual can be made a trustee without his consent; neither can Congress, or any other legislative or corporate body, be made a trustee without his consent. Congress has never given its consent to act as trustee for these slave-trading speculators; nor are we under any obligation whatever to pay over this money, or to do any other act for the benefit of these applicants. We, sir, are supreme; we acknowledge no law in the discharge of our official duties, except that of the Constitution and of justice. The Constitution has not imposed upon us the duty of acting as trustee for slave-dealers. If there be any obligation resting upon us, it must be found in the abstract justice of the claims presented by these slave-mongers. The whole question rests here. Neither the President, nor his Secretary of State, nor Mr. Stevenson, nor all of these officers together, could lay us under the least conceivable obligation to pass this law for the benefit of outlaws, of pirates, and of robbers. Nor could they render it our duty to grant any facility or encouragement to a commerce hated by man and cursed by God. What, sir! is it to be urged, at this period of the world, that the President has power to lay Congress under obligations to sit here and legislate to encourage the breeding and exportation of slaves? Are such arguments to be addressed to a Congress of American statesmen? Can the President and his cabinet release me from my obligations to the Constitution? Can they absolve me from the official oath which I have taken? Can they step between me and my God, and acquit me of the obligations which my Creator has imposed upon me? No, sir. There is no principle of justice or of propriety that requires us to legislate in favor of this commerce in mankind. On the contrary, our love of consistency, our self-respect, our attachment to liberty, our regard for the natural rights of mankind, our patriotism, our desire for the honor of our country, our attachment to the cause of truth, justice, and humanity; our respect for the opinions of mankind, and obedience to the commands of Heaven, forbid that we should become parties to the misrepresentations to which I have alluded, or be made the instruments for consummating this fraud committed upon a friendly nation; or that we should become partners in crime with men who make merchandise of the image of God.

SPEECH OF MR. J. C. CLARK,

OF NEW YORK.

In the House of Representatives, February 22, 1843—On the bill appropriating forty thousand dollars to enable the President to establish commercial relations between the United States and the Government of China.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I have more than half promised myself to embrace some fitting opportunity to submit a few remarks to the House. The opportunity is now presented. In the British Parliament, it is a legitimate ground of objection to a supply bill, that the objector has no confidence in the ministry. This bill proposes to vest in the President and Secretary of State a large discretion in the expenditure of forty thousand dollars; and I agree with my friend from Georgia [Mr. MERIWETHER] that there is good reason to doubt the propriety of giving to these men the disbursement of any money not imperiously called for by the exigencies of the public service. I place my opposition to this bill solely on the ground of an utter want of confidence in the political integrity of the President and some of his official advisers.

I have, sir, made some ineffectual attempts heretofore to get the floor. But there are certain gentlemen here always on the tiptoe to obtain it, and they are generally successful. Charmed with the melody of their own sweet voices, they fancy that the House is equally delighted, and they lose no opportunity to gratify us with a display of their oratorical powers. Of this I do not complain. It is their right. Many, no doubt, may have been convinced by the brilliancy of their periods and the cogency of their logic.

I regret to consume the time of the House, particularly at this late period of the session. The House will do me the justice to say that I have never obtruded myself upon its indulgence. During this entire Congress, I believe, I have not appropriated to my own use an hour of its time. I would not now, but for the conviction that the Whigs of the country ought to be awakened to a just appreciation of the character of the men (or some of them, at least) who have heretofore enjoyed their confidence—enjoyed it only to betray it.

And now, being up, I almost repent me of my half-made promise, and regret that my effort to obtain the floor has been successful. I have a great horror of speech-making—and, above all, of speech-making here. Surrounded with talents, eloquence, and criticism of a high order, I dread an exposure to their observation; and, perhaps, to their censure. Moreover, one knows not the temper of the House. He is ignorant of what subject may be acceptable, and is greatly puzzled to know by what proper exordium he may, in advance, gain a nestling place in some corner of its kind feelings. But I am in for a speech, and must bide my chance.

There is, sir, in rhetoric a thing called "aporia"—if I mistake not, defined to be "a figure of speech under which a speaker doubts where to begin." Now, sir, if we had another sort of figure under which congressional orators should doubt when to begin—and not only so, but to continue to doubt to the end of the session whether or not they should begin at all—such a figure would be of great advantage to the country, and, perchance, to the orators themselves, (myself included.) But had we such a figure, I could not avail myself of its supposed benefits—for I have begun. And as to the other figure to which I have referred, I am unable to derive any advantage from it—for I believe I known where to begin. And if I begin at the beginning, I shall not bear wide from the mark. Thus beginning, I shall explain to you the circumstances under which I resolved to subject yourself and the House to this infliction.

Not long since, confined to my room, excruciating under the turn of the rheumatic screws, I bethought me of the principle of antagonism, under the operation of which one force is expelled by a counter and superior force; and it occurred to me that if I could expel the enemy which had made a lodgment in my racked tenement, by the introduction of an agent more powerful in the infliction of pain—not that pain which leaves behind it visible scars, but which tortures and harrows up the soul—I should have gained an object of no inconsiderable importance. And here let me suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, being a good Whig, the propriety of imitating my example whenever you find yourself in the ultima thule of rheumatism, and on the confines of the gouty regions. I doubt not that you will be benefited by the experiment. In my case, it was eminently successful.

I thought, sir, of the present prostrate condition of that gallant and patriotic party which so joyously marched to victory in the autumn in 1840, and I thought too of the renegades to whom it owes all its calamities. The effect was magical. Corporeal suffering gave place to mental anguish; and in a transport of conflicting emotions of indignation, pity, and contempt, and, I may almost add, of revenge too, I threw aside my crutch, and in fancy took the field, armed at all points, ready to fight the baule over again, and to lend my feeble aid to crush the adders who have so cruelly, so ungratefully, stung the bosom of their benefactors.

In submitting the remarks which I deem it my duty to make on this occasion, I disclaim all private feeling. They will not partake, in the slightest degree, of the spirit of personal unkindness. And if they should seem to any gentlemen to be tinged with too much of acerbity, I beg of them not to attribute them to any malignity in my nature, (for, if I know myself, I do not possess any great stock of that disagreeable article,) but to the conduct of the men who have provoked them, and to the feelings to which that conduct has naturally given birth.

And here let me premise, that I have no exalted admiration of mere greatness—(and when I speak of greatness, I mean intellectual greatness)—none, none, sir—unless it be connected with the moral and political virtues. For I hold these virtues to be identical; and if you show me one hundred political knaves, I will show you of the same ninety-nine moral scoundrels. This greatness, when thus unallied, has no attractions for me. It should neither be an object of desire in the possessor, nor of admiration in the beholder; for it only serves to augment in the former the power of mischievous and guilty perpetration. When, however, to greatness of mind, are joined truth, honor, honesty, fidelity, and patriotism, then we instinctively pay it the homage of our respect and admiration. But when a great man stoops from his high estate, and panders to his diseased appetite for power, a the sacrifice of these ennobling virtues, we loathe im in the inverse ratio which they bear to his genius or his attainments, or to both combined.

Sir, men, and more especially great men, hold their popularity by a frail tenure. A maiden should not be more chary of her honor, than a great man, and particularly a great man in public life, should be jealous and watchful of his; for one false step forever blasts the reputation of both. If a solitary draft of his fidelity or his patriotism be dishonored, his political character at once sinks into irreparable bankruptcy. Guilty of one act of baseness, in vain may he attempt to fall back on his stock of reputation, however great, though hoarded for years with a miser's care. His virtues (if he has any) must be constant, progressive, and enduring to the end. The Scripture declaration, where "much is given, much shall be required" has received the practical sanction of the world. Arraigned at the bar of public opinion for one delinquency, in vain he may plead, even in extenuation, the splendor of his genius, the power of his intellect, or the magnitude of his services.

Arnold has rendered to his country great and distinguished services; but one act of treachery not only cancelled every obligation of gratitude, but consigned his memory to ignominy and contempt. Poetry, in the spirit of truth, has doomed to an inglorious immortality the wonder of his age, as "The wisest, greatest, meanest of mankind."

Thus appreciating men—and great men, too—you may not expect of me, when speaking of their blackslidings and deformities, an over-nicety in my selection of rhetorical ornaments. The hunter, (and I am no expert hunter,) when about to immolate the fierce and stealthy panther which may have crossed his path, seeks not for chaplets of roses with which to adorn the sacrifice. Place, however exalted, gives to its possessor no immu-ility for censure and condemnation, when deserved. But, in proportion to the exaltation of the recreant, should be the measure of the censure and condemnation.

I am not one who believes that a description of the President and some of his ministers, in their present attitude before the country, should be attempted in bland phraseology or honeyed accents. Their portraits should be sketched by a master's hand, (which I regret I do not possess)—not in the soft and mellow tinting of a Titian, but in the bold and startling coloring of a Correggio.

Office has its rights and privileges. Among them, I reckon not as one an exemption from the animadversion which delinquency merits. Place, mere place, confers no honor on its possessor; but, e converso, man gives rank and dignity to the office.

As one of the most prominent workers of mischief to the Whigs, to their cause, and to the ascendency of their principles, pre-eminent in genius and acquirements, stands the Secretary of State. In the order of importance, he deserves to occupy the foreground of the picture, in bold and frightful relief. But, as in every dramatic representation, whether of tragedy, comedy, or farce, there must be characters great and small, so my dramatis personæ must be, in some respects, presented in combination, as well the Magnus Apollo, as he who has justly earned a distinction conferred upon one of the old popes, of whom it was said

"Maximus in parvis, minimus in magnis."

The amusing and veracious author of "Ten Thousand a Year," in speaking of Tittlebat Titmouse, esq., M. P. for Yatton, and of the base uses to which he intended to devote his immense prospective wealth, remarks, "that the reptile propensities of his mean nature had thriven under the sudden sunshine of unexpected prosperity." Now, sir, I will not apply this language to the President of the United States; but I may be permitted to say that the sentiment is strikingly applicable to him—to his accidental advent to power—to his resolutions soon thereafter taken to perpetuate that power—and to his subsequent operations; all having in view the same objects.

I have no doubt that John Tyler came to Washington, on the demise of General Harrison, with honest intentions to administer the Government on Whig principles. His inaugural address bears on its face evidence of such intentions. The declaration that he should take as his model the "fathers of the Republican school," soothed the alarms of many Whigs who distrust Virginia politicians—I mean those of the modern abstraction school. The inaugural, taken in connexion with his partiality for Mr. Clay, and his tears shed at the Harrisburg convention over his defeat, were hailed by them as harbingers of prosperity to the country, and of safety to the Whig party. The sentiments of Mr. Clay in regard to the currency and to a national bank were well known to Mr. Tyler and to the country. For years they had been emblazoned on the pillars of the Capitol in characters of living light, and had illumined every hill-top in the country. They did not believe it within the range of possibility that Mr. Tyler, knowing, as he did know, the opinions of Mr. Clay on all subjects of national concernment, and who, at that convention and elsewhere, had manifested such an ardent zeal for his nomination to the Presidency, could turn his back upon his principles and his friend. What! said they, is it possible that he can be guilty of the glaring inconsistency of advocating the claims of a man to the Chief Magistracy, whose whole life and conduct stand pledged to give to the nation a sound currency, through the instrumentality of a national bank, and not himself be the friend of such an institution? Surely, said they, Mr. Tyler cannot believe a bank unconstitutional, else he could not, with any appearance of honesty or consistency, aid in placing in the presidential chair a man whose first official act would be a strong recommendation of that very measure! Though it might have been known to them that, at certain periods of his life, Mr. Tyler had entertained opinions hostile to a bank, they believed—and they had a right to believe—that his presence as a Whig delegate at a national Whig convention, avowing his predilections in favor of a bank candidate, and himself accepting a nomination from that convention for the second office in the Republic, furnished conclusive evidence of a change of opinion. Better men than John Tyler have changed their opinions in regard to a bank; and why may he not have seen, in the necessities of the times, and the afflictions of his countrymen, abundant reason to change his opinions also?

But the fond hopes inspired by the inaugural in the bosoms of the Whigs—of the pure and patriotic men who had taken Mr. Tyler from obscurity, and placed him on the pinnacle of power—were doomed to sad and bitter disappointment.

The good resolves with which he came here armed, were soon smothered in the impure embrace of a forbidden ambition. The fatal words second term were whispered into his too willing ear, and "all was lost." These have been the "open sesame" to all the woes and afflictions of the Whig party.

He found himself suddenly, unexpectedly, in the possession of power; and soon, very soon, tasked his ingenuity to devise plans for its perpetuation in himself and his successor. Surrounded by flatterers, he greedily inhaled their incense, freely offered, to gratify at once his vanity, and to administer to their own advancement. Pleased with the rattles with which his maiden ambition was tickled, new visions of glory flitted before his bewildered fancy, and new hopes swelled his tiny heart to the very verge of bursting. With a promptitude commensurate with the energy of his character and the magnitude of his towering genius, he issued to the admiring sycophants of his cortege the sic volo of his deliberations, and, in the stern language of a second Cato, thundered forth the terrific fiat—"Delenda est Carthago!"

The decree for the dismemberment of the Whig party was promulged from the palace, and his faithful vassals were charged with its execution. This decree became necessary to effect his object. The "one term" principle—a principle which I trust is now permanently incorporated into the Whig creed—presented an insuperable barrier to his re-election. That re-election could only be effected by a new, a third, a Tyler party, to be composed of a portion of the Whig party and the "odds and ends" of all parties.

Sir, had the President been left to himself, I doubt not that he would have proved true to his principles, to his country, and to his party. But, most unfortunately for him, for his country, and for the Whig party, he became the dupe, and perhaps the willing dupe, of more experienced plotters and contrivers.

Sir, I have them in my eye. In fancy I see the conspirators against the prosperity of the country and the welfare of the party to whose confidence and partiality they owe all their political consequence, stealing, under cover of the night, to the assigned place of rendezvous, ashamed that the blessed light of heaven should look out upon their baseness. Starting, like guilty things, at the echo of their own footsteps, with cautious tread they stealthily approach the Executive mansion. I see the prime mover of the plot—the Catiline of the group. His once majestic form, enshrining a spirit that might have out-paragoned the world, is now crouching, in very shame of its degraded position, in the ante-chamber of power. His once noble brow, on which the Almighty had impressed the signet of greatness, is now wrinkled by the force of contending emotions. That voice, which erst thrilled through the hearts of grave Senators and admiring millions, and which, when the battle waxed the hottest, was heard high over all, cheering on his brave companions to the onslaught, with the spirit-stirring appeal, "once more to the breach, dear friends, once more," is now subdued into hurried and mysterious whispers. It is the voice of Cæsar on his sick bed, "Titinius, give me some drink," and not the voice of Cæsar at the head of his conquering legions.

In clairvoyance, I watch with no little anxiety the portentous movements of the gang, threatening consequences baneful to the well-being of that devoted party which had so recently elevated them to place, and hurled from power the men who had long wallowed in corruption, and fattened on spoils wrung from the hands of honest but paralyzed industry. Hist! Again I see them! They now emerge from the security of their skulking-place. Under the guidance of the lurid glare of a blue light, throwing its sickly rays on the blanched cheeks of its bearer, they move with noiseless pace, in gloomy procession, towards the imperial closet. At its door, in mockery of majesty, and in derision of greatness, stands the trembling subject of their adulation, the object of their wiles, and the instrument of their ambition; and most cordially are they welcomed to his embrace.

At a coalition so unholy, and formed with purposes, the execution of which would prove so deadly to the parties concerned, and to the welfare of the nation,—even the goddess of mischief and discord, who had watched their movements with no little concern, and who was then flapping her raven wing with unwonted delight, veiled her face in confusion and disgust.

What transpired in the closet, though chronicled by the tutelar deity of the place, (her of the black pinion,) has not yet been promulged. Its record, however, is carefully preserved by its faithful custodier. She took it with her to her abiding-place; and it may be found in the archives of hell, in the same pigeon-hole containing the correspondence of Sir Henry Clinton with a notable personage, whose memory has come down to us loaded with infamy, and who, in co-fraternity with the heroes of my vision, will descend to posterity a stench in the nostrils of its latest generation.

Now, sir, although I may not speak from the record of the plottings of the closet, I may infer, from the acts and doings of one of the cabal, at least, the plan of operations by which the disruption of the Whig party was to be accomplished, and also the price to be paid to that distinguished gentleman for his continuance in office.

Sir, it is a matter of indubitable history, that in no one has a United States bank found a more uniform, able, and eloquent advocate than in the person of the Secretary of State. Up to April, 1841, there is no evidence that his opinions had undergone the slightest change on that subject.

It is equally well known, (certainly to many members of this House,) that, during the pendency of the bank bill before Congress, at its called session, the Secretary was busily engaged in the exertion of his all-powerful influence upon members, to give the "go-by" to the measure—promising to present, at the next regular session, a plan of currency and finance which should meet the views and wishes of the Whig party, and the expectations of the country.

How faithfully he has redeemed that pledge, and with what favor his plan, which was to have come to us pure and perfect as Tritonia from the brain of Jove, has been received by the House, let the voices of some eighteen gentlemen only in favor of the Secretary's "monstrum horrendum" of a Government bank (many of whom, I understand, would have voted in the negative had the question been on the bill itself) answer to the country.

Instead of standing by his principles with the firmness of a patriot, and with a self-sacrificing devotion to the great and paramount interests of the country, the Secretary became the humble apologist of John Tyler's delinquency—ay, and of his imbecility too. What had become of his vaunted boast that the pillars of the Capitol

"Should fly
From their firm base as soon as I"

Sir, like the courage of Bob Acres, when the hour of trial came, all his firmness and all his patriotism "oozed out at the ends of his fingers." It seems that the fear of the loss of place, like a spectre, has haunted him in all his out-goings and in-comings. Sir, had he assumed towards the President the port and bearing of a man resolved to go for the country at all hazards, maugre all personal and private considerations, I believe in my heart that at this moment the Whig banner would be proudly flouting the breeze in every direction. But the closet scene had been enacted, and it was no longer any part of his purpose to act the honest, faithful, and fearless counsellor of the President. The dignified and lofty minister of state had dwindled down into the mere sycophant and parasite.

I have said that the record of the compact has not been promulged. But I will hazard the conjecture, that the high contracting parties, for good and sufficient considerations them thereunto moving, resolved that, so far as they had the power, John Tyler should be elected President of the United States; that the political world should be turned upside down; that quiet should be thrown into confusion, harmony into discord, and order into chaos. The Whig temple, with its stately pillars and splendid capitals, reared with so much toil and care, and standing forth a model of political beauty and of strength, was to be razed to the earth; and from its disjointed materials, aided by cross-ties dug from the ruins of the Locofoco Herculaneum deluged by the molten lava of the revolution of 1840, was to be constructed a new edifice, and dedicated to the use of John the Third, President in his own right in 1845, and then to pass to his successor, Daniel the First.

Sir, it is my firm and honest belief that considerations other than those connected with the importance and delicacy of our relations with England had overpowering weight with the President in retaining Mr. Webster in the cabinet. He saw that a storm was in preparation; and, although at the time the cloud in the political horizon was no bigger than a man's hand, he felt that it would rapidly increase, and that, ere long, the little speck would become a desolating tempest. He wished for strength, for support, for allies, to enable him to weather the storm. And who at the North could give him more efficient aid than the man who, to talents of the very highest order, united in an eminent degree the respect and confidence of the Whig party? His means of mischief were in a ratio compounded of those talents, of that respect and confidence. Leaning on the pillars of his mighty reputation, which had cost him years of unremitted toil to erect, the Secretary vainly fancied that his fall was beyond the reach of human power. Vain illusion! Among the honest and sturdy Whig sons of the North, so far as my acquaintance extends, he stands almost desolate and alone, still majestic in the ruins of his own creation. Like the strong man, he has madly seized hold of the granite columns of his own fair fame; but, unlike him, he has buried with himself neither friends nor foes beneath the ruins.

The more recent conduct of the Secretary well warrants me in drawing conclusions unfavorable to the purity of motive which prompted his continuance in the cabinet, and his labors to defeat a national bank. I will not here inquire whether the President, in retaining Mr. Webster about his person, calculated upon his influence in the Senate—a place where he was weak, and where, in regard to confirmation of nominations, strength was highly desirable. Taking into view the character of the parties, and the nature and object of the coalition, it is highly probable that the potent influence of the Secretary was to be brought to bear on the north wing of the Capitol. Has an attempt been made to exert that influence? If so, it has most signally failed. The Whig portion of the American Senate, in the sternness of conceded virtue, and in the grandeur of unsuspected patriotism, with no stain of distrust resting on the purity of its purpose, or the constancy of its attachment to the principles of the party which it so ably represents, presents a spectacle challenging the respect, the confidence, and the admiration of the world. There, Executive influence has been powerless; here, too, it has been nearly so. The sum total of Executive recruits from the Whigs in Congress amounts to some four or five, all told. If my colleague from the Otsego district has inscribed his name on the roster of "the corporal's guard," it may swell up to six. How far the appointments of Locofocos to office generally, or the appointments of family connexions of Locofoco members of Congress in particular, or the promises of appointments (if such promises have been made) to Locofoco members themselves, to be made in future, may have influenced the course of the ultra Democracy on this floor, I take it not upon myself to say. That these appointments and promises have in no small degree softened the ferocity of Locofoco attacks, speeches of gentlemen might be cited in proof.

An honorable gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KENNEDY] not long since condescended, in a strain alike complimentary to the intellect and good nature of the President, to speak of him as "a good old soul!" What a biting sarcasm! Words of foulness and contempt! A good old soul, forsooth! Ay, when wielding the veto club to cleave down the Whig party, a "good old soul!" But, in his recommendation of the repeal of the sub-treasury, the "good old soul" has passed the vanishing point. When appointing Locofocos to office, a dear, "good old soul;" but, in retaining Mr. Webster in his cabinet, he is the incarnation of the evil spirit himself. What a President, and what a eulogist! The encomiastic satire of the one is in all respects worthy of the political profligacy and ingrained stupidity of the other.

I have spoken of executive influence. This influence may be beneficent or malign. Thus far, the conduct of the honorable gentlemen of the guard may be attributed to the former. Up to this period, I have neither the right nor disposition to impugn their motives. There may be doubters and skeptics on this subject; from such let me invoke for the gentlemen of the "guard" the charity of their silence. Wait for the developments of time—the great trier of things and of men. Wait till the 4th of March, 1845. If that day shall find them in this place, representing, with their well-known ability, the interests of their constituents; or, having been dismissed the public service here, it shall find them mingling among the masses; or, if that day shall find their shoulders unsoiled by the robes of office, —then may those who, from motives of prudence, now practise non-committalism, award to them their unqualified approbation—so far, at least, as motive is concerned.

I trust, sir, that by this good time the eyes of the Whigs of the country are fully open to a just appreciation of the motives and the management of those who have betrayed them, and made the vain effort to sell them to the support of the President.

Up to the period of the Faneuil Hall speech, there were no doubt some (perhaps many) Whigs who cherished the hope that Mr. Webster would return to the fold from which ambition in a fatal moment had tempted him to wander. They thought of his Herculean intellect and of his indomitable spirit when fighting in the Senate the battles of constitutional liberty; and they were slow to believe that he had left the camp of the faithful, to form a lasting alliance with a crooked, perverse, and uncircumcised generation. But, sir, that speech extinguished the last hope of his few remaining friends.

Those who believed that his efforts to defeat a national bank were prompted by considerations of anxiety for the peace and harmony of the Whig party, of the position in which a veto would place the President towards that party, and the effect of that position on that peace and harmony—those who believed that his continuance in the cabinet resulted solely from a conviction that he could there best serve the country, by conducting to a successful termination our negotiations with England—were compelled then to admit that they had extended to him a charity which he did not merit. Then it was that the painful reality of his tergiversation was fully realized. Then it was, reviewing the "tout ensemble" of the Secretary's course, that they discovered that ambition and the love of place, more than love of country, had counselled him to remain in a cabinet from which his highminded, pure, and honored colleagues had retired in disgust. And the honorable Secretary was not content to remain in his degraded position in silence. To evince his subserviency to the President, as a volunteer he appears in the public prints, and unblushingly heralds to the world not only his want of sensibility to insult, and of manhood to resent and repel it, but his fixed determination to remain in power, notwithstanding all the contumely which the President had heaped upon him and his late associates.

In his letter to the editors of the National Intelligencer, under date of 13th September, 1841, he informs us "that he had seen no sufficient reason for the dissolution of the late cabinet by the voluntary act of its own members."

Sir, the Secretary's optics were not usually sharp. His eyes were dazzled by the glare of the premiership in present possession, and of the presidential coronet in the distance. He is a Yankee—belonging to that tribe famed for its coolness of calculation, especially in all matters of pecuniary and personal thrift. Sir, I will not intimate that the Yankees are not as sensitive to attacks upon their honor as others—such an intimation would dishonor my own father, and all my kindred; but the Secretary seems to be an exception to the general rule of his caste. The alligator is not devoid of sensitiveness; but it is impervious to assault, and the hunter's attempts to reach it are vain. The rebounding balls of his enemy demonstrate the impenetrable nature of the coat of mail with which nature has protected him.

The influence of the Secretary over the President is said to be second to that of no other gentleman; but he remains here, "calm as a summer's morning," the quiet and pleased spectator of the persecution for opinion's sake which the fatuitourage of the President inflicts upon his ci-devant brethren.

What cares he that Jonathan Roberts, and thousands of others—good men; honest, faithful, and capable public servants—are rudely ejected from office, for no cause other than that of an attachment to Mr. Clay, to make room for the hypocritical neophytes to Tylerism, so long as he continues quietly to gnaw the bone of office?

Sir, the President exacts from his dependants a strict execution of the condition of the bond, though it may consist in the performance of services from which a well regulated and patriotic spirit would revolt. The Secretary was becoming enervated in the enjoyment of inglorious ease at Washington; an important election was about to take place in Massachusetts; he was therefore ordered by his taskmaster to gird on the armor, in which, like another Cœur de Lion, he had so often met and vanquished the stalwart knights of the ultra Democracy—to couch his unconquered lance against his once confiding and generous allies.

The same John Tyler who, in his inaugural address, proclaimed that "he would remove no incumbent from office who has faithfully and honestly acquitted himself of the duties of his office, except he has been guilty of an active partisanship, or by secret means—the less manly, and therefore the more objectionable—has given his influence to the purposes of party, thereby bringing the patronage of the Government in conflict with the freedom of elections;"—this same political pope, who, on the 28th of September, issued from the Vatican a pompous bull, threatening decapitation to executive officers who "had violated the obligations which they impliedly assumed on taking office under (my) his administration, of abstaining from any active partisanship, or in any way connecting their offices with party politics, or using them for party purposes;"—the same John Tyler unblushingly commissioned his prime minister to desecrate the "cradle of liberty," insult the Whigs of the old Bay State, and aid in the achievement of a Locofoco triumph in that venerable and patriotic Commonwealth! Who can compare this ukase of the President to the office-holders, with the electioneering tour of his Secretary, and not feel a contempt alike for master and for man? I know not which most to abhor—the base hypocrisy of the President, or the mean servility of the minister.

And thus, in this green morning of our national existence, for the first time has been exhibited to the astonished view of the American people the revolting spectacle of a political crusade of a Secretary of State against the peace and integrity of the party which elevated him to office, attended with the pomp and parade of official pageantry, and with the delivery of a partisan speech by this same Secretary, as destitute of taste and of power as it was insulting to the "good men and true" who were doomed to witness the degradation of their once beloved orator.

Sir, the time is not distant when the Secretary would give all the wealth of all the Indies to have every trace of that speech blotted from the recollection of his countrymen. Would to God I could throw over it the thick mantle of oblivion, and replace its unhappy author on the proud pinnacle he occupied on the 4th of March, 1841! Vain wish! The recording angel has performed his office: an ocean of penitential tears cannot efface the record. There will it stand, through all time, a monument of the frailty and folly of human greatness.

What must have been the anguish of feeling of men like Abbott Lawrence, when the mendicant orator, after referring to many offices in the customs filled with Whigs, and to the mission to England, so ably filled by an accomplished scholar and statesman—all of which opposition to the administration of Mr. Tyler might place in jeopardy—piteously inquires, "Where do the Whigs intend to place me? Where am I to go?"

Here, again, the fear of the loss of office—the necessary result, in this reign of terror, of a faithful adherence to principle—is most plainly developed. Sir, had there been in that assemblage one true, honest, and frank friend of the inquiring Secretary, he would, in response, have cited him to the 5th verse of the 27th chapter of St. Matthew, and, in the spirit of pity and of mercy, would have recommended to him the example of his great prototype, recorded in the verse referred to by the faithful evangelist.

A great man guilty of ingratitude to his friends, of the abandonment of his principles for the sake of office, and of treachery to his party, can find a resting-place only in the grave. There may his bones and his faults repose together, in the uncertain hope that the hand of friendship may place on the title-page of his biography the charitable maxim, "De mortuis nil nisi bonum." But, living, in vain may he invoke the charity of the world. He cannot escape the daily reproaches of friendship betrayed, of faith violated, and patriotism outraged, in the language of Scripture, should he "take the wings of the morning, and fly to the uttermost parts of the sea," even there will the voice of violated obligation reach him, and nightly disturb the repose of his bed-chamber.

The inquiry, "Where am I to go?" seems to have been made in the spirit of deprecatory anticipation. The 4th of March, 1845, will soon arrive. Then, in anguish and bitterness of soul, will he make the same inquiry. And the spirit of prophecy need not be invoked to indite the answer.

Then will rush upon him, with afflictive and soul-rending force, the frightful recollections of the past, and painful forebodings of the future. Though now glittering in the pride of place, the subject of heartless flattery and of hollow respect, then he will find "none so poor to do him reverence."

And now, the Secretary, having fulfilled his political embassy, no doubt enjoys with infinite goût the fruits of his treachery, in witnessing the chair of the Hancocks defiled by an ultra Democrat—the abettor of revolutions, the hero of clambakes, and the instigator of a rebellion which threatened to wrap a neighboring State in flames, and deluge it with blood.

But I must part with the honorable Secretary. We could have better spared a better man. But he has gone; and peace to his political ashes! It belongs not to me to write his epitaph. An honest, patriotic, and betrayed party, and a deserted country, will, in their own proper time, inscribe on his headstone an appropriate "hic jacet."

A few words more, however, before final leave-taking. Sir, the impudence of the Faneuil Hall speech is in keeping with all the circumstances under which it was delivered. Men of high standing and exalted worth—Mason, Russell, Quincy, Otis, Saltonstall, Lawrence, and others—had assembled to greet their old friend, and to hear from his lips the words of consolation and of hope. And what did they hear? Was their drooping courage aroused, to engage with fresh vigor in the battle then about to be fought in Massachusetts between the Whigs and their old restless and implacable enemies? Were they urged to the contest by that voice which so often had cheered them on to victory? No, sir; nothing like this. They were compelled to listen to a speech made up of self-glorification of the orator; of his apprehensions of loss of office, if he continued firm to his Whig principles; and of insolent and unmerited rebuke of his hearers. In the person of Abbott Lawrence, then before him, was the chairman of the Massachusetts Whig convention, then lately convened, to nominate candidates for Governor and Lieutenant Governor of the State. He and his associates in the convention were denounced for their virtue and independence, in declaring to the world a final separation between the Whigs of the old Bay State and their recreant President. Their right to utter these sentiments was challenged and denied; and they were insultingly told that they were sent to the convention for no such purpose.

In imitation of all similar conventions, they had adopted resolutions expressive of their opinions of public men and public measures; and for this expression they received at the hands of the arrogant Secretary the castigation of his censure.

[Here Mr. CLARK's hour expired. He gave notice that he would write out the balance of his remarks. He intended, if time had permitted, to have said something like the following:]

And, sir, it was not sufficient that the excellent gentlemen referred to were thus grossly insulted in public by an impudent, itinerant Secretary; but two of them—Abbott Lawrence, and my friend, the honorable gentleman who so ably represents the Essex district, [Mr. SALTONSTALL,] and who, by his genuine moral and political firmness, has endeared himself to every Whig in the Union—were selected by the Secretary as the peculiar subjects of ridicule and lampoon. They were caricatured in the columns of the court journal under the control of Tyler, Webster, & Co., in the following article, under the date of Oct. 13, 1842:

"Messrs. Webster and Cushing, it seems, have been guilty of the gross, the enormous offence of censuring the proceedings of a convention where Abbott Lawrence presided, and which Leverett Saltonstall addressed.

"The Secretary of State finding fault with the decisions of an owner of spinning jennies and a retailer of tapes and cottons! Ye gods! it doth amaze me. Is there no law in Boston for scandalum magnatum? No consideration of the decencies of station? Boston can be correct Boston no longer, if she allows an individual of mere intellectual notoriety and some slight political standing, to publicly admonish—nay, censure, 'berate and belabor,' (those are the very words)—a man whose vast mind has been deeply engaged in the coloring of cloths, and whose arithmetical science is so profoundly available. And Caleb Cushing belabors Leverett Saltonstall! Le jeu ne vaut pas la chandelle; i. e. the man who can hunt down an antler of ten, belittles his reputation by knocking over a poor Leverett."

Whether the same number of the paper contained the assertion that the Faneuil Hall speech and General Scott's letter had "put an end to Clay's prospects," or whether it contained the annunciation of the Whig defeat in Georgia in capitals—"The work goes bravely on!" "Great destruction of 'coons in Georgia!"—I do not at this moment remember.

And thus it is, that an expression of a difference of opinion with Mr. Webster subjects the most pure and intelligent merchants and statesmen of the country to the ribald scoffs and sneers of a man who is unworthy to unloose the latchet of their shoes.

Were there not in that convention those whose hearts throbbed with indignant emotion at this insolent assumption of ministerial prerogative? If there were not, then, indeed, has the blood of their revolutionary sires, of their Hancock, and of their Adams, ceased to flow in the veins of their descendants.

Sir, I will not impute to these excellent men the slightest insensibility to insult; and I hazard little in saying that, could the Secretary have looked into the recesses of their tortured bosoms, while listening to this outpouring of vanity, egotism, and venom, he would have discovered a conflict of emotions in which contempt and indignation were struggling for the mastery.

And here I must take leave of the honorable Secretary; and, in so doing, let me commend to his attention the fable of the kind-hearted husbandman and the frozen adder. Sir, I leave him to ponder on its moral, and draw from it what consolation he may.

But the honorable Secretary, though pre-eminent, stands not alone in the deformity in which ingratitude and treachery have clothed him. In the person of the Secretary of War, he has found a willing, if not an efficient coadjutor. Though he may not successfully compete with him in intellectual strength, he may aspire, with no humble pretension, to a fair portion of the honors with which insensibility, cold-heartedness, sordid ambition, and Iscariotism adorn their possessors. To a head of no inconsiderable strength and clearness, he joins a heart cased in triple steel, and responsive alone to the calls of self-aggrandizement. Untiring in application, and prompt in manœuvre, he watches, with cat-like intensity, the revolutions of the political wheel, and, careless of the power that propels it, obtains a quiet lodgment in its topmost bucket.

Though an Issachar in politics, "crouching down between two burdens" to effect his objects, his great archetype undoubtedly is Dan, who, in the prophetic language of the dying patriarch, was to be "a serpent in the way, an adder in the path, biting the horse's heels, so that his rider should fall backward."

Although the honorable the Secretary of War has enacted many astounding political summersets, he has exhibited, in his recent demonstration of ground and lofty tumbling, a rapidity and boldness of movement, a suppleness of conformation, an aptitude for juxtaposition, and a flipflappishness of harlequinry, which may well excite the unbounded admiration and applause of the most accomplished performers in the ring.

In September, 1841, the Secretary, indignant at the outrages committed by the President upon the honor and principles of the Whig party in New York, and acting upon that occasion as its champion, issued an address to the party, appealing to their injured patriotism and wounded pride to meet in convention at Syracuse to express their feelings of abhorrence at the usurpations and treachery of the President. In pursuance of this appeal, the convention met. But where was the burning and indignant John C. Spencer, whose voice was to have aroused the dormant Whigs from their lethargy, and infused new life and energy into their chilled veins, and rallied them to the polls at the election then approaching? Sir, he was among the missing. To the summons himself had issued, there was endorsed a return of "non est inventus." While, in obedience to that call, his faithful brethren were in consultation in regard to the adoption of measures best calculated to advance the best interests of the party and the country, Mr. Spencer, like a cowering and skulking culprit, afraid that the honest sun should peer out upon his treason, was crouching in a dark corner of a dingy room at Brown's, in this city, taking lessons from his fugleman in the art and mystery of making bows, grimaces, and congees, which might be acceptable to the tenant of the palace.

Sir, the secretaryship of which he is the incumbent was offered to, and finally conferred upon him, for the sole purpose of defeating the Whigs in the election referred to. The wire-workers at Washington knew their man, and the price to be paid for his apostacy. They knew him to be the author of the address, and they calculated that his appointment would lull the Whigs to repose. It was intended as a wet blanket for the Syracuse convention, and as an opiate to drug that portion of the Whig party who yet fondly (i. e. foolishly) hoped that John Tyler was true to his principles and to his party, into a fatal security. It was an artful game, most foully, wickedly, and, I regret to add, successfully played. The Whig party in the State was once more prostrated at the feet of the Locofoco Dagon—not by the power of open, generous enemies, but by the coldness and apathy of its friends, produced, in a great degree, by the defection of Spencer.

Well do I remember, sir, on my return home, when speaking to some of my Whig constituents of the recusancy of Mr. Tyler, that I was rebuked, and the appointment of the Secretary was referred to in proof of the President's fidelity to his party. Mr. Spencer, by a long course of hypocritical profession, had become a prominent and leading member of the Whig party in the State; and many, unacquainted with the history and the passions of the man, were incredulous to the suggestion that he was to be the instrument of the President for the prostration of their party in the Empire State. But the delusion has vanished; the scales have fallen from the eyes of the doubters, and he is now presented in the bald and naked turpitude of his character. He has performed the dirty work of his employers, and is now here receiving his reward, the wages of political iniquity. But, sir, I am happy to say that he no longer possesses the power of mischief to the Whigs of New York. The lion's skin has been torn from his recreant shoulders; and he stands forth a hyena, fattening on the mutilated corpses of his recent friends. The impotence of his last recent effort in the service of his master in the State of New York, was equalled only by its mendacity and impudence. In my judgment, my colleague was right when he told us the other day that, so far from having aided, it actually injured his (the Locofoco) party. The Whigs had become familiar with his duplicity, and were not again to be the subjects of his impositions. A few more such efforts would have aroused the Whigs throughout the State to a general and triumphant rally.

To the close observing portion of the Whig party, no evidence of Mr. Spencer's defection was wanted, other than that furnished by his acceptance of a place in a cabinet from which had been ejected Crittenden, Bell, Granger, and Ewing—men whom the Whig party delighted to honor—men in whose persons the entire Whig party throughout the country had been insulted by a fickle, vacillating, and imbecile Executive; expelled, because they would not compromise their principles, and, like the Secretary of War, play the apostate. I say expelled; for though the members of the cabinet (with one notable and dishonorable exception) resigned, yet a further continuance in it had become incompatible with self-respect, and with their duty to their party and the country. No true Whig, having the slightest respect for himself or for Whig principles, would have occupied a place from which the patriotic and talented Bell had been driven for his steadfast devotion to those principles.

Sir, the labors of love of Mr. Spencer were as useless as they were gratuitous and insulting; and he has no just right to join his colleague in office and in guilt, who aided in the overthrow of the Whigs in Massachusetts, in shouting pæans to the triumphs of Locofocoism in the State of New York, achieved by his agency.

It is said, however, that he has contrived to impose on the soft and plastic mind of his confiding Excellency the belief that New York writhes in the revolting embraces of the ultra Democracy, through the efforts of his faithful minister. I doubt it not. And I doubt not that, in the wassails of the palace, some insulated recess has often been vocal with the voices of the merry trio chanting hosannas to the conquerors of the Whig party and the despoilers of their country.

Sir, let them quaff on and sing on. The day of fearful retribution will soon come. Though now high in power, sparkling in its sunshine and revelling in its enjoyments, rest assured, sir, that their political "damnation slumbereth not." On the 4th day of March, 1845, by the common consent of all parties, they will be consigned to a political pandemonium, where, in the bosom of a restless and disappointed ambition, "the worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched."

Sir, amid all the gloom which treachery has thrown around the Whig party, I do not permit myself to doubt that its recuperative energies will marshal it to the field in 1844; and then, as in 1840, victory will again perch upon its standard. Let not the Locofoco legions "lay the flattering unction to their souls" that they are to have a bloodless field. No, sir; they shall have war—war tenus capulo, in all its honorable forms, and with all its consuming fierceness—and waged, too, with a spirit which would do honor to the most chivalric campaign of 1840.

Under the banner of patriotism, inscribed with the name of the honest, frank, fearless, and patriotic "Harry of the West"—associated, as I confidently trust it will be, with the name of a Northern gentleman well known to the country for his fearlessness, integrity, and indomitable spirit, and under which all opposed to the Robespierrean Democracy, be they old Whigs or new Conservatives, may rally—the Whig party will again take the field, and wage the war with the spirit and enthusiasm which characterized the triumphs in New York in 1838 and 1839, and the general triumph throughout the country in 1840. Under such a banner, and with such a spirit, we shall reconquer the laurels of which treachery has robbed us, and again attempt (and, under the auspices of a faithful President, successfully attempt) to raise the country from the horrible pit of Locofocoism, and place it on the rock of solid and enduring prosperity.

SPEECH OF MR. TALLMADGE,

OF NEW YORK,

In Senate, February 6, 1843.—On the exchequer.

The bill "amendatory of the several acts establishing the Treasury Department" being, on motion of Mr. TALLMADGE, taken up, he proceeded to address the Senate to the following effect, in explanation of the provisions of the bill:

Mr. T. regretted (he said) that he had not been able to bring forward this measure at an earlier period. The delay had not occurred on his own account, or through his instance, but had been yielded to the request of other Senators. Some two weeks since, it had been assigned a day under a special order. Meantime, however, came on the important debate (on the Oregon question) which has so much occupied the attention of the Senate. Until this—unexpectedly prolonged as it had been—was terminated, he had not chosen to distract the attention of the body by a double discussion. The Senate would pardon him this little preliminary vindication of himself against a possible imputation of remissness, or of disregard for his own voluntary pledges of bringing forward the measure anew at the earliest time in his power.

The general purpose of the bill (Mr. T. went on to say) is to do something for the country, as to currency and exchanges. Substantially, the bill is the same as that brought in last winter by report of that select committee of which I had the honor to be chairman. To the report then submitted with the bill, the Senate will allow me to refer them for those more amplified details and arguments which are less necessary now that the Senate is in possession of the general plan. I propose, at present, only to re-state those larger points of then measure, upon the soundness of which, and their competency for the object in view, the entire question must rest.

As, then, what is mainly proposed is to do something which may redeem the currency and exchanges of the country from their present wretched confusion, it is at least necessary, for the formality of a regular argument or investigation, to ask what would, in every other sense, be superfluous—whether the country at large stands in any vehement, any unusual need of such interposition, such exertion of any power applicable to the purposes in view as the Government may possess?

If the common disasters of a whole land ever challenged justice or pity from its rulers; if a desolation more widely spread, if less total, than any which the ravages of war ever inflicted, is a thing demanding public relief; if a general havoc of nearly all private fortune, and an overthrow of all public credit, are matters that call for some effort of the prudence or power of the whole community,—I may surely, in the unexampled distress which convulses the entire body politic, find enough to warrant me in saying that the need of doing something is terrible, and its delay inexcusable, if there is within the legitimate and safe resorts of our Government anything that can be done.

The condition of the country I will not attempt to describe. I am not master enough of the imagery of suffering and gloom to paint a picture of such various and such cruel calamity. Afflicting as it is to look upon, it is doubly painful from the strange, the violent, the dismal contrast which it offers with the youth, the strength, the customary prosperity of our country, and the teeming resources which vainly lie all around us. We are beggars in the midst of the most boundless natural wealth; we are starving in the midst of the unexhausted fertility of a soil capable of yielding us almost anything; and the profusest blessings of nature, and the highest boon of political freedom, seem, for the time, bestowed upon us equally in vain.

For all this there must be some adequate cause. Visibly to all eyes, it is the extreme and rapid reduction of the circulating medium—under the heavy individual and public engagements which an equally extreme previous inflation had given rise to—which has produced, and threatens greatly to prolong, all that we are suffering. Such (though not the sole) is certainly the great and leading cause of what, as politicians or statesmen, we must speak; because it is clearly to this cause that we must address ourselves, as to the only thing worthy of a statesman's thoughts, or a test of his skill—the possibility of a remedy.

I, sir, and those with whom I have generally concurred in political views, have (I repeat) felt satisfied that, though there may have been many causes for this state of things, yet the great and immediate one lies at present in the deranged condition of the currency and exchanges of the country. As to the origin of that derangement, there may be a diversity of opinion; but there can be none as to the existence of the fact, and little as to the powerful influence which it exerts in all that we are now witnessing.

Without question, it is one of the saddest and one of the most dangerous characteristics of party and of politics in this country, that, unscrupulous of everything but to strengthen their own momentary force, they seize, and endeavor to make a part of themselves, everything alike—no matter how little of a party nature, and no matter how much the prejudice to the public interests which may ensue from thus transforming many questions purely national into matters of partisan warfare. There is no subject which, in point of magnitude, in point of universality, and in point of being proper to trade alone, was less fit to be flung into the mere cockpit of party strife, than this of the currency. Yet, unfortunately for the country, the instant that it could be rendered anything that it should never have been—anything that it could never, with safety to the country, become—it was, from a commercial, turned into a political question—the mere watchword and battle-cry of conflicts with which such a simply commercial question should never have been mixed. It was not to the agitation of political passions, ever extreme and exaggerated in what for the moment occupies them, that such a question could be committed for any safe decision. As long as such questions are made the rallying call of party, derangement of the currency and exchanges will continue; and the consequent derangement of the whole business affairs of the community. It is surely time, amidst the extremity of distress into which this false and unhappy management of the question, has plunged us, to drop those party distinctions and think once more of the public sufferings around us, and the duty—if there be a possibility—of lightening or even relieving them, by a calm and a prudent legislation. In this great council, holding in its hands to such an extent the destinies of the entire nation, the first consideration should be, how best to fulfil what we owe to the country at large, now reduced to a condition too disastrous to be much longer endured. That condition, I hesitate not to say, in my judgment imperatively demands that we unite on some such measure of relief as that proposed by this bill. The time unhappily is past, when, unembarrassed by the difficulties which delay has thickened over the matter, we could, comparatively at our ease, have deliberated of measures and methods now no longer in our choice. Formerly we might, with a freedom to select from all that experience offered of good, have held calm counsel as to what was best: now, reduced to far sadder afflictions, and with a far narrower choice of modes of relief, we are left to ask not "what is best?" but "what is it now possible to do?" The people are crying aloud on all sides for relief. For that relief they turn their eyes, from all quarters of the country, to this Government. They ask you not for relief from their private, their individual misfortunes, which they know you cannot cure; but relief from a wretched condition of the circulation, which denies them all possibility of redeeming and retrieving their losses, and which you can cure. They ask you to give them, not an illegitimate and individual aid; but to afford to their private necessities the indirect assistance of what the public business as imperiously requires—a better mechanism of interchange, a sounder vehicle of their business and of your own. Such is demanded, not more by individual convenience than by the public interests. If, in the management of its own finances, the Government can, at the same time, furnish an element of exchange that will go far to give the country what it so much needs, and what seems so little attainable in any other way—a sound currency—is it not bound to do so?

Are gentlemen, then, to fold their arms and pronounce that nothing can be done? Here is at least a measure which will do something. It may not accomplish all that could be wished: but it will effect much. It cannot fail to afford to commerce a good and a general instrument, which it does not now possess: it must, to its entire extent, infuse into the circulation an element of correction and soundness; and these indirect but important effects as to private business will be but incidental results from a system of which the more immediate benefits accrue to the Government itself, as to the distribution and management of its receipts and disbursements.

In what it thus proposes, there is surely nothing that is not strictly compatible with the constitutional powers of the Government—with such powers, I mean, as are inseparable from its duty of the collection, safekeeping, and disbursement of the public revenues. If, in performing these functions, it can, at the same time, indirectly and incidentally afford to the business of the country facilities of exchange and currency which involve not a loss but a benefit in the public business itself, surely it is strongly its duty to do so. The provisions of this bill aim at nothing more.

It will, at all events, establish one great and fundamental principle—a principle which is the dividing line between the extremes of parties, and which lies at the bottom of all these systems, whether they present themselves in the shape of a national bank, an exchequer, or in any other form—namely, that it is the right and the duty of the General Government, in the collection and disbursement of its revenues, to aid in furnishing a uniform currency, and regulating the exchanges of the country. Much will have been achieved by the establishment of this great principle, and the foundation will be laid, on which a superstructure can be erected, with proportions regulated by the constitutional powers of the Government and the wants of the country.

Since the foundation of this Government, different methods of effecting this object of connecting the management of the public revenues with the regulation of the currency and exchanges have been tried. Of these, the earliest and much the longest preserved was a national bank. To it succeeded what was called the State bank deposite system. The sub-treasury, of still briefer existence, was the last-born of these expedients; but died (not a very promising child) in its infancy.

The oldest, and infinitely the most successful of these successive contrivances, dates almost from the foundation of the present Government. It owed its conception to the sagacity of the ablest man that ever stood at the head of our national finances—Alexander Hamilton; who, in 1791, recommended a resort to such an institution as a remedy for the extreme derangement then existing in our monetary and financial affairs. Its success answered admirably to the powerful judgment of him who had proposed it. Scarcely had it gone into existence, when the confusion which it was meant to remedy stood rebuked. Order at once rose up out of the chaos and embarrassment of the treasury, and soundness out of the derangement of the circulation. For twenty years, lending these advantages to our moneyed system, it stood, the very capital of the column of this great man's just fame. In 1811, however, when its charter ran out, a set of republicans a good deal more righteous than George Washington and the other patriots who founded the Government and this bank almost together, voted it anti-republican, and refused its re-charter. Still, in that day, what called itself republicanism was not so wise as to scorn the most positive experience, the clear demonstrations of actual fact; so that when, after five years' trial of the fiscal and constitutional advantages of being without a bank, they found themselves, in 1816, involved anew in all that financial confusion which had been so happily removed by the original creation of the bank, they, the republican opponents of that dangerous institution, re-established it.

I need scarcely say, sir, that, as before, it lifted the finances and currency of the country out of the mire, where they were stuck; and gave us, until a new political war was declared against it, a currency as perfect as any commercial country in the world ever possessed. In spite, however, of these conspicuous benefits, and the manifest rashness of abandoning, for a more than questional experiment, a system which had so admirably performed its great and difficult functions, the country allowed itself once more to be hurried, by the all-powerful influence of a single great leader, into a fresh demolition of the bank, and a new essay of currency-mongering.

In accordance with the views of the party with which, from my first entrance into public life, I had acted, I myself, in 1831, was opposed to the re-charter of the bank. The Senate will pardon me if I repeat a little incident which occurred soon after I took my seat in this body, and which my own subsequent impressions have often served to recall to my recollection. After an incidental discussion on this subject, in which I had taken part, a distinguished Senator from Kentucky said to me: "Sir, there was a young man from the West in Congress in 1811; and he, upon the constitutional notions that are now governing you, voted against re-chartering the old United States Bank. Time rolled on, and troubles came. We attempted to get along without a national bank: but at last we found that without it we could not manage the public finances, nor maintain for the country a sound and uniform currency. That young man then became convinced by experience that the vote which he had given in 1811 was wrong; and in 1816 he gave his voice for the chartering of another United States bank. You have now taken the same ground that that young man originally did: but, like him, time and experience will, I have no doubt, eventually convince you that you have done wrong."

Sir, I stand here to confess that time and experience have convinced me accordingly, and to acknowledge that I was wrong, and Mr. Clay right; that the affairs of the Government and the country cannot be safely managed without the aid of some mechanism of that sort; that of such, that of a United States bank has proved itself far the most perfect that has ever been tried in this country; and that it is greatly to be lamented that, through mere party causes and their unfortunate influences, a state of public opinion has been brought about which renders it impossible now to recur to what is of itself greatly to be preferred to any other financial agent that we know of.

I need scarcely, sir, do more than advert to the events of the extra session of 1841. For both the bank bills passed at that session I gave my vote. I regretted, of course, the negative which the President felt it his duty to put upon them; and regretted it still the more, because I considered it as terminating all hope of obtaining for the country the best and most efficient of financial contrivances, and as reducing us to an expedient of secondary excellence. For, be the advantages of the older institution ever so unrivalled, what possibility can we any longer look to of again carrying that system into effect, for the extrication of the country from its present extreme embarrassments? We legislate not for what might have been, but for what is; for facts as they exist, not as we would have them. We have to consider, not what this or that party desired to accomplish and could not; but what it is now possible to effect of best and soundest. Let gentlemen who yet look to a national bank remember that some six or seven years must certainly elapse before that mode of relief can be made available to the country. Suppose our present hopes to be realized by the election of 1844: contested as the subject of a bank must continue to be, under almost any condition of parties, it must be nearly the end of the long session of the next year before a bill for this purpose can pass; another year to negotiate the stock; another to get the bank into operation; and at least another before the people can have been made to feel any of the marked benefits of the institution. Can the country, bleeding as it is at every pore, wait under its present agonies for relief so long deferred as that? No; some early, some present ease is needed; something timely to what we now suffer, and not appropriate merely to a future state of quiet and of comfort.

Having thus, sir, passed in review the chief points of the history of the most permanent and solid of the successive fiscal contrivances through which our financial system has been made to act, I come next to that confident resort of President Jackson—the State bank deposite system—for the sake of whose infinitely steadier, more manageable, and less pervertible mechanism, the flourishing finances of the country were dismantled and knocked down to their lowest stone, in order to be rebuilt upon another foundation and of different materials.

Of that experiment the memory is too recent for me to have need to say much. Suffice it to say, the system was recommended by President Jackson, and adopted by the party which sustained his administration. His prophecies of its entire success were too remarkable for me to omit some little citation of them.

In President Jackson's first annual message after the deposite-bank system had been put into operation, he spoke as follows:

"The experience of another year has confirmed the utter fallacy of the idea that the Bank of the United States was necessary as a fiscal agent for the Government. Without its aid, as such—indeed, in despite of all the embarrassment it was in its power to create—the revenue has been paid with punctuality by our citizens; the business of exchange, both foreign and domestic, has been conducted with convenience; and the circulating medium has been greatly improved. By the use of the State banks, which do not derive their charters from the General Government, and are not controlled by its authority, it is ascertained that the moneys of the United States can be collected and disbursed without loss or inconvenience, and that all the wants of the community, in relation to exchange and currency, are supplied as well as they have been before. If, under circumstances the most unfavorable to the steadiness of the money market, it has been found that the considerations on which the Bank of the United States rested its claims to the public favor were imaginary and groundless, it cannot be doubted that the experience of the future will be more decisive against them.

"It has been seen, that, without the agency of a great moneyed monopoly, the revenue can be collected, and conveniently and safely applied to all the purposes of the public expenditure. It is also ascertained, that, instead of being necessarily made to promote the evils of an unchecked paper system, the management of the revenue can be made auxiliary to the reform which the Legislatures of several of the States have already commenced in regard to the suppression of small bills; and which has only to be fostered by proper regulations on the part of Congress, to secure a practical return, to the extent required for the security of the currency, to the constitutional medium. Severed from the Government as political engines, and not susceptible of dangerous extension and combination, the State banks will not be tempted, nor will they have the power which we have seen exercised, to divert the public funds from the legitimate purposes of the Government. The collection and custody of the revenue being, on the contrary, a source of credit to them, will increase the security which the States provide for a faithful execution of their trusts, by multiplying the scrutinies to which their operations and accounts will be subjected. Thus disposed, as well from interest as the obligations of their charters, it cannot be doubted that such conditions as Congress may see fit to adopt respecting the deposites in these institutions, with a view to the gradual disuse of the small bills, will be cheerfully complied with; and that we shall soon gain, in place of the Bank of the United States, a practical reform in the whole paper system of the country. If by this policy, we can ultimately witness the suppression of all bank bills below twenty dollars, it is apparent that gold and silver will take their place, and become the principal circulating medium in the common business of the farmers and mechanics of the country. The accomplishment of such a result will form an era in the history of our country, which will be dwelt upon with delight by every true friend of its liberty and independence. It will lighten the heavy tax which our paper system has so long collected from the hard earnings of labor, and do more to revive and perpetuate the habits of economy and simplicity, which are so congenial to the character of republicans, than all the legislation which has yet been attempted."—Message of December, 1836.

Again, in his annual message of the next year, he holds the same confident language, as follows:

"Experience continues to realize the expectations entertained as to the capacity of the State banks to perform the duties of fiscal agents for the Government. At the time of the removal of the deposites, it was alleged by the advocates of the Bank of the United States that the State banks, whatever might be the regulations of the Treasury Department, could not make the transfers required by the Government, or negotiate the domestic exchanges of the country. It is now well ascertained that the real domestic exchanges, performed through discounts, by the United States Bank and its twenty-five branches, were at least one-third less than those of the deposite banks for an equal period of time; and if a comparison be instituted between the amounts of service rendered by these institutions, on the broader basis which has been used by the advocates of the United States Bank, in estimating what they consider the domestic exchanges transacted by it, the result will be still more favorable to the deposite banks."

He proceeds to state the large amount of exchanges which the State banks have transacted, and the laudable public spirit they were displaying in bringing specie into the country; and then winds up with the following commendation of the system and its high success:

"In the same manner have nearly all the predictions turned out in respect to the effect of the removal of the deposites—a step unquestionably necessary to prevent the evils which it was foreseen, the bank itself would endeavor to create in a final struggle to procure a renewal of its charter. It may be thus, too, in some degree, with the further steps which may be taken to prevent the excessive issue of other bank paper; but it is to be hoped that nothing will now deter the Federal and State authorities from the firm and vigorous performance of their duties to themselves and to the people in this respect."

Meaning rather to recall events, by touching on them, than in any sort to recite them, I will only remind the Senate with what fury, upon the collapse of this system, they who had constructed it, and (for their own political ends) stimulated all its vices, fell not only upon the contrivance itself, and the particularly favored banks that made a part of it, but upon all other State banks. Till now, using these institutions as their auxiliaries in the war upon a national one, they had magnified them as the sole legitimate and constitutional form of banking and of finance, the only creations of a competent authority, the legal offspring and heirs of State sovereignty, and not less safe in a commercial or fiscal sense than proper in a corporate one. Up to this point, national banks alone were hydras, monsters, and all that; while State banks were everything that was fair, well-proportioned, and safe; nay, invested, as to the Federal power, by their origin from that of the States, with an emanation of something which the former merely derivative and secondary authority must not lay impious hands upon. Now, however, in the progress of this Jacobin and Jesuit finance, came a new doctrine—that, because they had debauched a part of the State banks, all banks were illegal, and not less a fraud and inimical to the community when created by State, than when by Federal authority. In short, the very system which they and General Jackson had but a few months before exalted as so safe, so practical, so constitutional, was at once denounced as the most grievous of curses, and the most wrongful of monopolies.

In this warfare upon the deposite banks I did not join. But they were, as everybody knows, speedily crushed; and there was an end of system the second.

Of the third—that of the sub-treasury—my history shall not be long; because its life was too short for any but the briefest commemoration. It had, as everybody knows, been opposed by the party in a mass on its first introduction in the other House by General Gordon, of Virginia. This, however, did not hinder its being taken up on the explosion of the former plan of finance. Still, it could not be carried until thrice recommended by President Van Buren, with the endorsement of General Jackson. Finally it passed; but only went into operation to show how hollow it was of all that it was pretended to be; how illusive as to all its promised solidity; how unreal, except in the dangerous power it possessed, and the irresponsibility, the corruption, and the peculation to which it gave scope. In a word, it lived but long enough to draw down a general mockery and odium.

Such, sir, has been this series of improvements in currency and finance, up to the last, yet unacted on—the exchequer project of President Tyler or his Cabinet.

When, at the last session of Congress, this plan was placed before you, much discussion arose here on the question of its reference. In that discussion I took no part, choosing to reserve myself for an unbiased examination of it in committee. The measure, however, in its original form, underwent in the Senate so full and so able a discussion, that the views of Senators were disclosed at large, and the objections on all sides thoroughly understood, before the reference was finally settled. When, therefore, the subject was placed in the hands of a special committee, of which I was made chairman, they were possessed of all these objections, and in a condition to weigh, and, if possible, to obviate them all. With these objections specially in view, the bill now before the Senate had been framed and amended, and, with such deliberation and solicitude, as led the committee to trust, not without some confidence, that they had performed their task in such a manner as to steer clear of whatever defects had been detected in the original form of the measure.

The first class of objections thus taken related to the apprehended influence which the Executive might exercise over the institution, chiefly by means of his power over its officers as to appointment or removal. Upon this power we have placed an effectual guard, to the whole extent that the Constitution permits. We could not divest the President of the right to nominate the three superior officers of the exchequer—the commissioners of the board; but we have rendered them, after confirmation by the Senate, incapable of being removed, except with the concurrence of that body. He may, for physical inability, or neglect, or violation of duty, suspend a commissioner; but, unless he show to the Senate sufficient cause for the act, the officer is restored. Such is the entire extent of the executive control over the board; and its inferior officers or agents are dependent on itself, since they can be appointed or removed by the Secretary of the Treasury only upon its recommendation. It is easy to see that the entire tenure of office is thus, as to the President, rendered as independent as possible under the Constitution. The executive patronage is limited to the nomination of the three commissioners, and the executive control or interference to a temporary suspension of the same officers from their functions, for specific causes.

The second class of objections related to the power of dealing in bills of exchange; of which the purchase was considered as involving an illegitimate and dangerous mixture of the credit of the Government with the solvency or faith of individuals; as likely to be used for party or personal corruption or favoritism; and as very capable of leading to fictitious dealings in exchange, for fraudulent purposes. This power, then, the committee struck out, as dangerous, not only for these reasons, but because, for its discreet and safe exercise, three things are almost indispensable—individual interest, individual skill, and individual vigilance. These cannot be expected to act in a public institution as they do in those affairs which men conduct on their own account; and the former are, therefore, disqualified from the transaction of such business.

For all legitimate business of this sort, however, the committee have sufficiently provided in another way, preserving its benefits, and excluding only its risks. They have authorized the exchequer and its agencies to sell bills of exchange on itself, and to collect them, paying their amount to the depositor only when collected by the agency at the place on which drawn.

By its sale of bills, it will accomplish for individuals the legitimate operation of remitting funds, and withhold itself only from the illegitimate and dangerous one of anticipating them. He who wishes to do this, may still resort, for a temporary discount, to a local bank, whose business is this of anticipating funds at a distance. Meantime, he may collect those funds through the exchequer or its agencies.

The facilities of business, which this system of selling and collecting bills of exchange will give, will promote the sounder interests of the country, not less than would the power to purchase exchange; while, at the same time, the Government will be kept safe from all loss or hazard.

The third class of objections related to the issue of treasury notes on the credit of the Government; that is, its adding to its indirect power over the monetary circulation of the country, through the management of its revenues, the direct power of supplying a currency.

As to any issue, by the exchequer, of any currency, as such merely—any credit currency—I have been unable to discover any motives for such a thing except two: 1st, in order to anticipate the revenues of the Government; 2d, to aid the currency of the country by an addition to its circulating medium. But of the first of these, the committee hold that it is wrong in principle. Its tendency would be to bring about excessive issues, and to induce a resort to these mere expedients, rather than to a discharge of its less popular duty of levying adequate supplies. It will be dispensing with the most salutary and certain of all checks upon the Government—its inability to raise money without the consent of the people through their Representatives. In any unusual emergency, where the means in the treasury unexpectedly fell short, resort may be had to the authority of Congress for the issue of treasury notes, bearing interest as a loan, but not sent out as a currency. So much for the first point. As to the second, the committee regard the purpose as (for the reasons already given) unwarrantable, and its attainment as of most questionable possibility. If the existing currency were far below the business wants of the community, then much of it, as now, would stand upon a more solid basis than any mere credit circulation, although emitted by the Government itself; so that the latter would necessarily be an addition to the depreciated currency, an equal part of which it would be almost certain to displace and drive out of the circulation, by reducing its value still lower; and thus no permanent addition to the circulation could be made in this way. A fresh disorder only, and a further depreciation, would be produced.

With the mere fluctuations of the medium of exchange, Government cannot safely interfere. These must be left to regulate themselves, through the agency of individual sagacity, keeping watch over its own interests. To be safe, it must be left to its own voluntary power of expansion, as little capable of being directed, and as quick and subtle to manage itself, as the power of the eye to dilate or contract, according to the quantity of light which you pour upon it.

The committee, therefore, have discarded from the bill everything like a proposition for a credit circulation. They contemplate no addition to the currency. The business of discounts they leave to the local institutions, as proper only to them; and, as according to the ease with which these can be obtained will be the varying quantity of money which will be poured into the circulation or driven back from it, expansion and contraction will be left to the instinctive care of private interest. The committee, in a word, have not aimed to devise a system which shall furnish a complete currency; but only at one which shall infuse into that which we already possess a new element of soundness, and resorts of convenience which it cannot now command.

They propose, then, that the bills issued shall only be for specie deposited, dollar for dollar; the amount of such paper in circulation being never permitted, in any case, to exceed the specie on hand for its redemption. The bills thus issued are called specie notes, in contradistinction to treasury notes emitted on the credit of the Government only, either as a currency or for the purpose of borrowing.

These specie notes, issued to the public creditor in disbursement out of the actual receipts of the revenue, or to individuals upon deposites in specie, will form a currency of the most perfect character, combining the convenience of paper with the solidity of coin; so that they will be everywhere preferred to the latter. They will neither increase nor diminish the currency, but merely give it a new activity and a wider uniformity; so that the unaugmented quantity will perform a much greater office. They can produce no expansion or contraction of the currency, no inflation, no rise or fall of prices, no expulsion of coin from the circulation, such as attends other emissions of paper.

It may, however, be urged, that a circulation thus formed can afford no relief, or, at best, a very slight one. I answer, that the capacity of such a currency is not to be measured by its amount, but by the peculiar functions (now attainable in no other way) which it will perform.

Uniformity of value in the currency is now the greatest benefit that can be bestowed upon commerce. In showing, as I have already done, that the Government cannot safely issue a credit currency, I have sufficiently shown that we cannot aim at supplying, integrally, the whole amount of currency, uniformly valuable, which the country requires; and that, except upon this plan of adding nothing to the circulation, we should only lessen, instead of increasing, this quality in the currency. The partial but important good to which we must then restrict ourselves, is the supplying, not circulation in the mass—for that, the variously depreciated paper of each quarter already affords—but a new and universally current circulation, which may pass alike from sphere to sphere, and from vortex to vortex of these local circulations, each limited to its own locality, and unite them all. It is not as to this local purpose of a circulation that we are suffering, but for something that can perform the distant offices of interchange. Such must the proposed currency become, entering but little into any local circulation, but making itself the vehicle of distant transactions, from sphere to sphere of the local circulations; to which, of course, in amount, it need bear but a very small proportion. But, as to the amount of the Government disbursements, or something like it—say twenty or twenty five millions of dollars—may be added the equivalents to individual deposites of specie, and the sale and collection of bills of exchange, it will be seen that an amount of specie-notes will probably be kept afloat quite equal to very important purposes. Emigration, travel, and the deposite of gold and silver by foreigners seeking to purchase lands, would also add considerably to the amount.

Let it, in this view, be recollected that the average circulation of the United States Bank was about ten millions of dollars; and, until 1829, only about six millions; and that its specie was usually equal to its circulation. This exchequer, creating a still greater confidence, and commanding means to a large, could surely perform the same general functions—admitted to have been so beneficent—as that bank could accomplish with only the amount of circulation which I have mentioned.

I doubt not that, besides all these advantages to trade, it must act, in a variety of ways, and especially by bringing about speedy and singular settlements, to keep the banking institutions of the country generally sound. Nor can it well fail to restore to the circulation a large amount of specie which individual distrust of banks has unquestionably withdrawn and hoarded. Though it may not (as I have said) effect all that the times have need of, but no longer permit, it must clearly accomplish much. As to any defects which it may have, they can, I think, be none of them of a sort so capital but that we shall be able to correct them as they make themselves felt.

From what has been said, the principles of the bill are sufficiently obvious. As to the effect on the currency and the exchanges, I cannot so well set it forth as by quoting the views on that subject which were embodied in my report. They are as follows:

The committee, on this whole subject, have consulted some of the ablest, most practical, and experienced men; and their own views are fully confirmed by the information derived from such high sources. They cannot in any way so well illustrate this branch of it, and its beneficial effects on the sound local banks, together with other advantages, as by briefly embodying the following views which have thus been communicated to them:

"A bill drawn by one agency on another, in any remote part of the United States, will be as good as specie within the commercial sphere of the emporium where the agency is located at which payment is to be made, and may generally be negotiated above par by any holder within that sphere, and at a rate in some measure proportioned to his distance from its commercial centre. If, for instance, a merchant in Cincinnati wishes to remit money to a manufacturer in Connecticut, a bill drawn by the agency in Cincinnati, where the deposite is made, on the agency in New York, would be worth one-half per cent. more than specie to the payee.

"Exchanges through the agencies will meet all the exigencies of the markets. It not unfrequently happens that New Orleans is indebted to Ohio for agricultural products; Ohio to New York for manufactured goods, domestic or imported; and New York to New Orleans for cotton. Every well-informed merchant in those several sections will be advised of the state of the markets. A New Orleans merchant wishes to remit to Ohio; he deposites his specie in the agency at New Orleans, and gets the same office to accept his own bill of exchange for $1,000, payable to the order of his Ohio correspondent, and transmits it accordingly. This will be above par in the Ohio market, because it is a good remittance for New York, where bills on New Orleans command a premium. It is bought by an Ohio merchant, who remits it to New York in payment for goods; and from New York it is sent to New Orleans, to pay for cotton. Upon its arrival, it is presented to the agency where it was accepted, and the specie is ready for its redemption. The holder, however, not willing to be burdened with the specie, will generally prefer the specie-notes of the agency. Thus this $1,000 in specie, after paying a small premium at the agency, will have paid more than its amount in two remote markets, sent a safe and convenient currency of $1,000 into the channels of commerce, and is still at rest sustaining this amount of circulation.

"The use of bills of exchange will not be superseded by the specie-notes of the exchequer. The former have always been referred, and were extensively used under the two national banks when their paper, in sound credit, had every advantage which this will possess, of being made such a substitute. This proof from experience is conclusive. One ground of preference, which has always been appreciated here and in Europe, is, that bills of exchange are more safe than bank notes, as they offer no temptation to robbery or embezzlement; and, as several may be sent of the same tenor and date by different conveyances, (in which case, no loss will be sustained if any one arrives in safety,) the risk may easily be reduced almost to an impossibility. The perfect character of these bills of exchange, with their undoubted credit, will generally give them a preference over others. They will never be protested for want of funds, at the office where they are payable. No embarrassment can result from the necessity of transmitting specie from office to office. The occasions are very rare (and, if this system were in operation, would be still more rare) in which specie needs to be removed; as for almost every purpose good paper is preferred. The paper of one office would generally be as good as specie in most others. If a deposite were made in New York to meet a draft on the office in New Orleans, this latter office would prefer the New York paper to coin, in the common state of exchanges. When the system has been some time in operation, specie will have found its proper places of repose, and movements of it would seldom be required. Should an apprehension be entertained that the retirement of specie into the agencies would embarrass the banks, it will be dissipated by a little reflection upon the operations already described. Those officers are bound to deliver, at the time of deposite, an amount in paper equal to the amount received in specie. That paper will take the place of the specie which it represents, and the same portion of it will be deposited by merchants and others who keep their accounts in banking institutions as of the specie for which it is a substitute. As it will be a lighter and more convenient circulation, it will mingle more with the paper of banks of sound credit in common commercial operations, and consequently be more frequently used in making payments upon discounted notes and other indebtedness to moneyed institutions, than specie now is. When possessed by a bank, it has all the value of specie. If means are wanted for deposite in an agency, this paper will be received of a bank, for that purpose, as readily as specie. Should gold and silver be wanted for exportation, or any other extraordinary demand, the bank which possesses this paper has the certain means of converting it, at pleasure, into the article required. Every bill of exchange payable at these offices will, at its maturity, restore to circulation, either in specie or this sound paper, the amount deposited for its procurement. Indeed, it is difficult to foster a doubt that, in regard to the means of redeeming their own emissions, the banks will possess more ample resources than at present. It is true, that the channels of commerce will be partially filled with a medium of sound and imperishable credit, which will stand the shock of every possible vicissitude, except the subversion of the Government. But this will promote the strength of the banking institutions no less than the stability of the currency.

"From the establishment of a national corporation with a large specie capital, the banks were apprehensive of sustaining injury by the great and sudden withdrawment of the precious metals from their possession. But the agencies can produce no such embarrassment; for their progress will be too gradual to cause any convulsion; and the immediate restoration to the market of a medium of equal amount and value with that which is withdrawn, will enable those institutions at any time to command the specie which they require. As a just price is to be paid for exchanges, it is believed that all the expenses of conducting the business of the exchequer and its agencies will be defrayed from that source, and probably a much larger sum may be realized. The losses of the currency by fire, shipwreck, and other casualties, as shown in the experience of banks, would not be an inconsiderable item of gain. A small premium (say a half or quarter of one per cent.) might reasonably be exacted of depositors, if hereafter deemed necessary, upon notes issued in exchange for specie. While this system will furnish the desired means for the collecting, safekeeping, and disbursement of the public revenue, and all the requisite facilities for exchanges between different sections of the country, as well as create a sound and convenient currency, it is exempt from the objectionable features of other modes of effecting, in part or in whole, the same objects heretofore presented for consideration. It authorizes no banks or other corporations, no discounts, no lending on credit in any form whatever, no expansion of the currency by public drafts or otherwise, no paper money resting on the credit of the Government, and depending on accruing revenues for redemption. It confers no extent of executive patronage or influence. No officer can be either appointed or removed by the President, without the concurrence of the Senate, and only for certain specified causes. It confers no discretionary powers by which partialities may be indulged in behalf of a personal or political favorite. Whoever presents his specie notes, or bills of exchange, at maturity, is entitled to his specie; and whoever presents his specie, is entitled to the paper which he selects. The rights of every applicant are defined by law, and his transactions at the agency are of the simplest character. The laws of trade, and not any superintending board or public agent, decide the amount of deposites, bills of exchange, and paper currency. The wants and means of individuals composing the community will best regulate the proportions of paper and specie, in the absence of all artificial restraint and supervision of the Government."

Shall we, then, Mr. President, adopt this measure with the modifications I have proposed; or shall we, in spite of the cries which appeal to us on all sides—the terrible and wide-spread distress that reigns over the whole country—the alarming paralysis of all industry and trade—the frightful sacrifices of property that are happening everywhere, and all the appalling difficulties that have frozen up the courage and the hopes of the country to its very heart, calmly sit down, dismiss all thought of attempting a remedy, shut our eyes, stop our ears, and determine to do nothing? Do nothing, did I say? Do nothing, whilst the country is bleeding at every pore for want of action here? Do nothing, whilst our commerce is languishing, our manufacturing and mechanic interests paralyzed, our agricultural products rotting on our hands for want of a market! Do nothing, whilst an agonizing and distracted people are looking to us for relief! Do nothing, whilst the cries of helpless women and children, with starvation before them, are borne to us on every breeze! Do nothing, because the time has gone by for the adoption of one favorite measure, and because the time has not arrived for the adoption of another! Do nothing—yes, Mr. President, do nothing, whilst the country is sacrificed between the conflicting interests of contending parties! Sir, I need add no more. During the last ten years, since I have been honored with a seat in this body, I have endeavored, faithfully, fearlessly, and conscientiously, to discharge my duty, without regard to consequences, personal or political. I shall continue so to discharge it; and, without intending the remotest reflection on the motives and conduct of others, I shall always feel a proud consciousness, in the introduction of this bill, and in advocating its passage, of having done my duty to myself, to my constituents, and to the country.

SPEECH OF MR. RIVES,

OF VIRGINIA,

In Senate of the United States, March 2d, 1843—On the bill for carrying into effect the treaty with Great Britain.

The bill for carrying into effect the treaty with Great Britain being under consideration, Mr. ALLEN of Ohio moved to amend the sixth section of the bill, which "empowers the President, in execution of the eighth article of the treaty, to apply so much of the naval appropriations as may be necessary therefor, to the preparation, equipment, and maintenance of the naval force therein stipulated to be employed on the coast of Africa by the United States," by adding a proviso, that the sum so applied shall not exceed $240,000. The question being upon Mr. ALLEN's amendment—

Mr. RIVES rose and said, that if the treaty be executed at all, it ought not to be executed by halves. He was in favor of a full, exact, and faithful compliance with the stipulations of the treaty on our part, till there had been some overt act of contravention to it on the part of Great Britain, which he had seen no sufficient reason to apprehend. It is in this way only that the national faith and honor can be preserved intact, and that the other party will be left without excuse, if there should be any disposition on its part not to act fully up to the spirit and intention of the arrangement. The sum limited by the amendment of the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. ALLEN,] was obviously, and even glaringly, inadequate to the support of a squadron of eighty guns, with its proper complement of men and officers, on the coast of Africa; and considering it, therefore, equivalent to a negative on the full execution of the treaty, he should unhesitatingly vote against it.

Nor (said Mr. RIVES) can I concur in the suggestion of my honorable colleague, [Mr. ARCHER,] that the whole of the sixth section of the bill might, without impropriety, be stricken out. On the contrary, I see in it, with pleasure, a seasonable recognition of the doctrine successfully maintained, after an arduous conflict, by the Republican party on two memorable occasions—Jay's treaty in 1795, and the commercial convention with Great Britain in 1815—a doctrine which I believe to embody the true reading of the Constitution, and which establishes the principle, that, in regard to all matters submitted by the terms of the Constitution to the action of Congress, (as in this instance, the power to provide and maintain a naval force,) the stipulations of a treaty must depend for their execution on the free and responsible co-operation of the legislative department. This, too, is in conformity to the British practice. On a recent and analogous occasion in that country, the slave-trade conventions of 1831 and 1833 with France, after having been duly ratified by the treaty-making power, were formally enacted into law, word for word, by the authority of Parliament, and clothed with all the specialities of a British statute. Surely, in our popular representative system, there ought not to be less a constitutional balance and control, in the hands of the legislative department, to the treaty-making power.

The principle recognised by the sixth section of this bill acquires an additional hold upon our attention, in the present instance, from the consideration that, if, unfortunately, there shall hereafter arise any serious practical disagreement between the two Governments respecting the true intent and meaning of the arrangement which has been entered into, it may become the solemn duty of Congress to interpose its high remedial powers, as it did in the memorable example of 1798, in our relations with France, for the purpose of putting an end to stipulations which have not been reciprocally observed by the other contracting party, in their true spirit, and fair and obvious import.

I repeat, Mr. President, that I do not, and will not, anticipate the occurrence of any such disagreement, until much more substantial grounds for the apprehension than any which have yet appeared shall disclose themselves. When Sir Robert Peel, in the speech which was commented upon here a few days ago, says that the British Government, by the treaty of Washington, had not abandoned or renounced the doctrine of the right of visitation, as laid down in Lord Aberdeen's letters, I can readily comprehend the declaration. It was not the purpose of that arrangement to adjust a creed, or establish a code of abstract principles. No abandonment or renunciation was asked from Great Britain of any doctrine or principle she maintained in regard to the alleged right of visitation. It was sufficient that we wholly denied the existence of any such right; and that we had, in the most solemn form, through the highest organ of our international relations, proclaimed that denial to England and the world. The rights we claimed were to be held, not by the concession or acknowledgment of any other power, but by our own confidence in their justice, and by our determination to maintain them.

But there were practical evils admitted by both Governments, which required a practical remedy. The flag of the United States had been extensively abused on the coast of Africa, by the slave-dealers of nations which had granted to Great Britain the right of search for the suppression of the slave-trade, to cover the iniquitous traffic in which they were engaged. The cruisers of Great Britain, in the execution of this right of search, conceded to them by certain powers of Europe and America, and pursuing what they alleged to believe were, in reality, Spanish, Portuguese, or Brazilian vessels, which sought to disguise themselves by fraudulently hoisting the flag of the United States, had, in many instances, visited and detained bona fide merchant vessels of the United States, and subjected them to interruptions, more or less injurious, in the prosecution of their voyages. These interruptions and detentions of the vessels of the United States became (as, of right, they ought to have become) the subject of spirited remonstrance and demand for redress upon the British Government; and were engendering a serious degree of irritation and dissatisfaction in the relations of the two countries. The Government of Great Britain constantly alleged, in extenuation or excuse of these cases—which were, from time to time, brought to its notice—the fact (admitted by our minister) that the flag of the United States had been "grossly abused" by the vessels of other nations, to cover their criminal and unlawful pursuits. They further declared (what, indeed, it was difficult to gainsay) that, unless effectual measures of some sort were taken to prevent this abuse, the flag of the United States would become the shelter under which the malefactors of all nations would prosecute, with impunity, a traffic which the laws of the United States were the first to denounce as infamous, and to pursue with the severest penalties.

The Government of the United States felt that, whatever measures were necessary to protect the national flag from abuse, either by our own citizens or by the subjects of foreign powers, the adoption and the execution of those measures belonged to the United States themselves. It was inconsistent with the principles which they had invariably held in regard to the mutual independence and equality of all nations on the ocean, as well as with their own jealous sense of national dignity, to confide the supervision of their flag, in any case, to the cruisers of another power. To remove from themselves, therefore, all possible reproach of even a negative connivance at the abuse of their flag by the vessels of other nations, and at the same time to take away from British cruisers all pretext for interference with the American flag on the ground of such suspected abuse,—while they gave to the world the most unequivocal pledge of their sincerity, and determination to aid in all proper measures for the final extinction of the African slave-trade, the United States proposed, in concurrence with the British Government, the employment by the two countries of "independent" squadrons, of "sufficient and adequate" force, to cruise on the coast of Africa, and "to enforce, separately and respectively, the laws, rights, and obligations of each of the two countries for the suppression of the slave-trade." The distinctive and avowed principle of the arrangement, on its face, was the separate and independent action of the naval force of the two countries; and was obviously intended to supersede, in practice, so far as its operation extended, any visitation of the flag of the one power by the cruisers of the other.

That the legitimate and bona fide effect of the arrangement, within the sphere and for the time of its operation, is to put an end, in fact, to those visitations and detentions of the American flag on the coast of Africa, which had been the subject of complaint and discussion between the two Governments, whatever arguments or pretensions may still be urged by the British Government on the abstract question of the alleged right in general, is placed beyond all controversy by a recurrence to the correspondence between the representatives of the two Governments in London, which preceded the negotiation, and furnishes the true key to the interpretation of this arrangement. It was, as I have already stated, the extensive and admitted abuse of the flag of the United States by the vessels of other nations, which sought, by fraudulently assuming it, to protect the guilty traffic in which they were engaged from detection and arrest, that the British Government constantly put forward to excuse or justify the visitation of American vessels by their cruisers. Lord Aberdeen, in his letter of 13th October, 1841, to Mr. Stevenson, says:

"The confession of Mr. Stevenson, that the trade is extensively carried on under the fraudulent use of the American flag, does, in truth, justify the whole claim put forward by the British Government. It constitutes that reasonable ground of suspicion which the law of nations requires in such a case. The admitted fact of this abuse creates the right of inquiry."

Now, when effectual measures have been taken by the United States to prevent this abuse of their flag, by the employment of an adequate squadron of their naval force on the coast of Africa for the purpose—measures which have received the solemn and deliberate concurrence of the British Government, with an express recognition of their "sufficiency" by the terms of the treaty, and after "consultation with the British negotiator" (as the President informs us in his late message to the House of Representatives) "as to the quantum of force necessary to be employed in order to obtain the object in view"—such measures, the "adequacy and sufficiency" of which are admitted by the British Government itself, are taken by the United States to prevent the abuse of their flag, the logical and necessary consequence, even upon their own principles, is, that the visitation or detention of American vessels, which they have attempted to justify or excuse only by the fact of that abuse, must cease with it. It is, says Lord Aberdeen, "the admitted fact of this abuse which creates the right of inquiry." But when effectual provision is made to prevent and guard against this abuse, by an arrangement to which Great Britain is herself a party, the right of inquiry, or visitation, which was built upon the hypothesis of that abuse, must, to that extent at least, cease to exist. It requires no express agreement, under these circumstances, to create the obligation of abstaining from the visitations and detentions of the American flag, which had been complained of. In such a case, res ipse loquitur. The transaction explains, and carries its meaning and obligation on its face.

Any renewal, under such circumstances, of the vexations to which the American flag had been subjected on the coast of Africa, would be in direct contravention of what was universally understood here, upon the spot of the negotiation, to be the practical effect of the arrangement. It could not fail to give rise to the gravest possible question in the relations of the two countries. I cannot, and will not, believe that there is any such design on the part of the British Government. When it is recollected what honorable and emphatic language was employed, but two or three years ago, on this same subject, by that remarkable man—the master-spirit of his country—whose firm and steady hand now guides the course of her public councils, the highest personal pledge is superadded to the most solemn national guaranty. I allude, of course, to the Duke of Wellington. In 1839, when a bill for the more effectual suppression of the slave-trade was brought forward in the House of Lords, by the administration of Lord Melbourne, to indemnify officers of the British navy for visiting and detaining any foreign vessels on the high seas, on suspicion, and examining their papers, the Duke of Wellington protested against it with all the honest energies of his high intellect and character. If his speeches on the occasion have not been incorrectly reported, he denounced it as a novelty in the legislation of the country, and in the practice of nations. He admonished their lordships that there was "one great nation, at least—the United States of America"—who would not submit to it; that, if there was one point more to be avoided than another, it was that relating to the visitation of vessels belonging to the American Union; and, finally, he warned the Government not to proceed with their bill, but "rather to issue an order in council, or a declaration of war!"

While I feel, therefore, (said Mr. R.,) every assurance which can be inspired by the faith of a solemn international transaction, and by declarations of the most imposing weight in the public councils of Great Britain, that there will be no attempt to renew in practice, under existing circumstances, the visitation of the American flag on the coast of Africa; yet it cannot be denied that the abstract doctrines recently put forth by the British Government in regard to an alleged right of visitation, are well calculated to arouse the timely attention of the United States and the other maritime powers of the world.

I know, Mr. President, how precious every moment of the time of the Senate is, on this the last day but one of the session. I do not mean, therefore, to enter into any systematic discussion of this grave and most important question. But, being compelled to differ, in an essential respect, from a document of very high authority, (I allude to the message of the President to the House of Representatives on the 27th ult.,) and deeming it of very great moment, if an error should have been inadvertently committed in that exposition of the doctrines of maritime law, as supposed to be contended for by the United States, that it should not go forth to the world with the presumed concurrence of the other branches of the Government—which would naturally be inferred, if no dissent were expressed in either House of the National Legislature;—the Senate, I am sure, will bear with me, even at this late hour, while I state, as briefly as the nature of the subject will admit, the principles which I conceive to have been heretofore invariably maintained, with the justest reason, by the Government of the United States.

It is of the utmost importance that there should be no misconception or uncertainty as to the position the United States occupy on these vital questions, affecting the general freedom of the seas. Providence seems to have cast upon us, in an especial manner, the responsibility and the honor of being the standard-bearer in this great cause. While the attempts made, from time to time, by other nations to sustain it, have given way to the seductions of temporary expediency, or been crushed by the force of powerful combinations, the United States alone, through every vicissitude of fortune, and often with fearful odds against them, have stood forth the steady and unwavering champions of the immunity and independence of flags upon the ocean. The efforts and writings of our great statesmen in this cause—of Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe—no less than the brilliant deeds of our warriors, in the same glorious struggle, are among the proudest illustrations of our past history. We must be cautious, therefore, to surrender nothing which has been thus dearly and nobly won.

The message of the President to the House of Representatives, while denying the right of Great Britain to exercise a general police over the flags of independent nations, yet asserts that if the vessel of another nation—of the United States, for example—be suspected of piracy upon what shall seem probable cause, the seizure and detention of such a vessel by a British cruiser, though the suspicion turn out erroneous, would give rise to neither public responsibility, nor any claim of indemnity to the owner. "The right, under such circumstances," says the message, "not only to visit and detain, but to search a ship, is a perfect right, and involves neither responsibility nor indemnity." Now, Mr. President, I must say, with all respect, that this doctrine of the message seems to me not to have been very well considered, and cannot be easily reconciled with those impregnable principles of public law, upon which we have heretofore stood against the world in arms. I had supposed, that if any principle of the maritime code had been triumphantly vindicated and upheld by the labor of American statesmen, it was this:—that, in time of peace, there is no right, in any case, on the part of a foreign cruiser, to interrupt or detain the vessels of another nation upon the high seas; that a vessel of a nation on the high seas, in time of peace, partakes of the inviolability of her territory; and that any entry on board such vessel, without consent, is, in the eye of the law, a trespass. If a vessel, under the circumstances supposed in the message, be suspected of being a pirate, a foreign cruiser may, upon her responsibility, stop and examine her; but she does so at her peril. If the suspected vessel be in reality a pirate, no harm will have been done; but if, on the other hand, she prove to be a bona fide vessel of the nation whose flag she bears, a trespass will have been committed, involving both responsibility and indemnity, according to the circumstances of the case.

It would not be difficult to show that these principles have, in other times—and those, too, not distinguished by any peculiar favor shown to the maritime rights of other nations—been recognised in the fullest manner by the highest British authorities. In a well known case brought before him as judge, the celebrated Sir William Scott (afterwards Lord Stowell) emphatically declared that "he could find no authority that gives the right of interruption to the navigation of States upon the high seas, except that which the right of war gives to belligerents against neutrals." But the whole doctrine upon this subject has been stated in so lucid and comprehensive a manner, and with such self-evident reason, in a despatch of Mr. Monroe, while Secretary of State under the administration of Mr. Madison, that I cannot forbear to quote here what was said by the American Government, with so much weight of authority, on that occasion. In the instructions to our plenipotentiaries for treating of peace with Great Britain, dated the 15th April, 1813, the American doctrine—the matured and carefully considered result of our long discussions with that power on the subject of maritime rights—was thus clearly and deliberately summed up:

"That the vessels of a nation are considered a part of its territory, with the exception of the belligerent right only, is a principle too well established to be brought into discussion. Each State has exclusive jurisdiction over its own vessels. Its laws govern in them; and offences against those laws are punishable by its tribunals only. The flag of a nation protects everything sailing under it in time of peace; and in time of war likewise, with the exception of the belligerent rights growing out of the war. An entry on board the vessels of one power by the cruisers of another, in any other case, or the exercise of any other authority over them, is a violation of right, and an act of hostility."

It is incumbent upon us to maintain this principle of the law of nations inflexibly, and in its undiminished integrity. The inviolability of the deck of an American vessel on the high seas, under all circumstances, in time of peace; and in time of war, with those limited exceptions only which are established by the acknowledged laws of war as affecting neutrals—is a doctrine indissolubly connected with our national honor and security. To admit a right of entry on board an American vessel on the high seas, in any case, in time of peace, is to surrender the principle, and to open a door for the most dangerous abuses.

On this subject, we may learn useful lessons from the history of the past. In our long and bitter controversy with Great Britain respecting impressment, unable to find any principle of the law of nations which gave her the right to enter on board American vessels in quest of British seamen, she defended the practice under cover of a right of entry acknowledged to exist in time of war, for a wholly different object. She said that, by the acknowledged rules of international law, we have a right to board and search neutral vessels in time of war, for contraband and enemies' property; and being, in the exercise of this unquestioned right, lawfully on board an American vessel, if we find British seamen there, we may lawfully impress and carry them away; though we had no right, in the first instance, to go on board for such an object. This was the British argument, in justification of the impressment of seamen on board American vessels, gravely put forth to the world in the memorable declaration of the Prince Regent of the 9th of January, 1813.

Now, Mr. President, if, contrary to the whole current of doctrine and authority by which we have been heretofore guided on this subject of maritime rights, we yield a right of entry into an American vessel in time of peace, in any case, upon the plea of suspected piracy, or any other,—do we not afford a cover, under which Great Britain, if her pride or policy should dictate, may be emboldened to renew her claim of impressment, even in a time of general peace? She might well say (after the formula of the Prince Regent's declaration) that, being rightfully on board, upon suspicion of piracy, by your own admission, and finding there those we claim to be our seamen, we will impress them, in the name and by virtue of that natural allegiance which our laws declare to be permanent and unchangeable, and which is due in peace as well as war.*

Of all the pretexts for the violation of our flag, the loosest, and most susceptible of abuse in practice, would be the plea of suspected piracy. What are the external indicia of a pirate? A low, long, black-looking vessel, we are told; and, under this description, every Baltimore schooner would be subject to be boarded and overhauled. What, in the modern use of language, constitutes piracy itself? In the plastic hands of diplomacy or power, nothing is susceptible of a greater variety of Proteean shapes. We cannot have forgotten that, in a solemn official communication which the late British Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Lord Palmerston) caused to be addressed to this Government, in justification of the destruction of the Caroline within the limits of our territory, the citizens of the United States who took part with the inhabitants of Canada in the late insurrection in that province were gravely characterized as "American pirates;" and an elaborate argument from Mr. Webster was necessary to prove that this application of the term was not proper. In the discussions which took place between the same minister and our representative in London, on this very subject of the right of visit, he habitually denominated vessels supposed to be engaged in the slave-trade, as "slave-trading pirates;" and he repeatedly and emphatically appealed to the denunciation of the trade as piracy by the laws of the United States. It is easy to foresee, therefore, how, under an admitted right of visit, and search also, according to the message, upon suspicion of piracy, with a little of the dexterity and boldness of diplomacy in the use of language, the whole of our growing and important commerce on the coast of Africa might be driven from those seas by insupportable vexations.

The only security to the rights of American navigation on the ocean, and for the honor of our flag, is to adhere inflexibly to the doctrine which was maintained by our fathers, and which has been delivered down to us from the great oracles of public law in Europe and America—that, in time of peace, there is no right, in any case whatever, on the part of a foreign cruiser, to enter and detain, on the high seas, (whether under the name of visit or search,) a vessel which bears our national flag; by which, of course, is meant the legitimate and bona fide flag of the United States. In the British discussions of this doctrine, it has been very unfairly argued, as if we claimed some mysterious virtue for the mere outward ensign—"the piece of bunting," as Lord Palmerston permitted himself to call it, "with the United States emblems and colors upon it;" and that any vessel engaged in the slave-trade could protect herself from search by merely hoisting one of these pieces of bunting; and that thus British vessels, engaged in a violation of the laws of their own country—Portuguese, Spanish, and Brazilian slave-traders, expressly subjected to search by the treaty stipulations of their respective Governments—and notorious piratical outlaws—would all be enabled, by this fraudulent disguise, to pass on with security, before the eyes of a British squadron. Now, Mr. President, it is hardly necessary for me to say that all this is purely gratuitious. The immunity we claim is for bona fide American vessels, entitled to carry the flag of their country. We admit, in the most unqualified manner, the right of British cruisers to visit, detain, and search their own vessels, Portuguese, Spanish, and Brazilian vessels, and piratical outlaws, even though any of them may have fraudulently assumed the colors of the United States. But, to render the act lawful, the vessels thus detained and searched must be truly what they are suspected to be—to wit, British, Spanish, Portuguese, Brazilian, piratical—and not bona fide American vessels. It is an acknowledged maxim of universal law, that every party, while exercising his own rights, must take care not to violate the rights of others—Sic utere tuo, ut non alienum lædas.

Our late able and distinguished minister in France (General Cass)—who, at a critical moment for the honor and safety of his country, and with a promptitude and success which give him lasting claims upon the gratitude of the nation, came forward to vindicate the principles of our American doctrine in the eyes of Europe, and especially of our ancient and chivalrous ally—has furnished, in his admirable exposition on that occasion, an illustration of the subject, from the transactions of civil life, which cannot fail to carry conviction to every mind. He compares the situation of a British cruiser, claiming and acknowledged to possess the right to visit and detain British, Portuguese, Spanish, and Brazilian vessels on the high seas, to that of a ministerial officer of justice, under the municipal law, who has a writ or warrant of apprehend against a particular individual. His lawful authority is to arrest A; but he suspects B to be A in disguise. This suspicion gives him no right to arrest B; but he may do so, at his risk. If the person apprehended turns out to be A, the act is justified by the event; but if, on the other hand, he be truly B, then a trespass has been committed, and an action of false imprisonment lies against the officer. In this action, the damages, it is true, may be materially reduced and mitigated by the consideration of strong circumstances of suspicion in regard to the identity of B, and the little actual injury he may have sustained; but, in every case, the inviolability of the personal liberty of the citizen is maintained, and vindicated as an inexorable principle of the law. In like manner, we can never admit as a matter of right, (however circumstances, in rare and extraordinary cases, might be allowed to mitigate or extenuate the trespass,) the claim of the British Government to visit and detain American vessels on the high seas, in time of peace, because they may be suspected of being British, or other vessels lawfully subject to search, and seeking to screen themselves by hoisting American colors. If British cruisers, under such circumstances, visit and detain vessels which turn out to be bona fide American vessels, they do it, necessarily, at their risk, and without right.

It is curious and instructive to trace the successive phases under which this claim has been, at different times, presented by the British Government. It was first brought forward by Lord Palmerston, in his letter to Mr. Stevenson of the 27th August, 1841. It was then claimed as "a right to see, by an examination of papers, that the vessel bearing the flag of the United States was provided with papers entitling her to wear that flag, and proving her to be United States property, and navigated according to law;" and it was to be exercised generally under "circumstances which justify a suspicion that such vessels are engaged in the slave-trade." The annunciation of the claim was met by our minister (Mr. Stevenson) with an energy and decision, and a ready ability, which do him much honor. A change of administration having occurred, the subject passed into the hands of Lord Aberdeen. While re-asserting the British claim, he did so in far more limited and cautious terms. In his letter to Mr. Stevenson of 13th October, 1841, he described it as a right to "ascertain, by visit and inquiry, the nationality," simply, "of the vessel," and limited it to cases of "the most grave suspicion and well-founded doubts of the genuineness of its character." The claim, as yet, was not qualified by any admission of the obligation of indemnity in case of mistake. At length came the letter of Lord Aberdeen to Mr. Everett, of the 20th December, 1841, in which his Lordship states that "it is, in spite of the utmost caution, an error should be committed, and any American vessel should suffer loss and injury, it would be followed by prompt and ample reparation." Here, it is readily admitted, is an important modification of the ground originally assumed. But, in the same letter, the right is still asserted, in absolute terms, to visit and detain American vessels on the high seas, when their nationality is suspected, in order to ascertain, by their papers or "other proofs," the genuineness of their character; and we are now, it seems, formally apprized, through a despatch of Lord Aberdeen to Mr. Fox, that this alleged right continues to be maintained by the British Government, and will not be abandoned. To this there is but one answer,—that the right claimed is still denied by the United States, and will never be admitted or acquiesced in; and I trust, sir, when the official answer shall go from this Government, due care will be taken to guard against any inferences, to the prejudice of those doctrines of maritime law which we have hitherto invariably maintained, from any hurried or inadvertent expressions in the recent message to the House of Representatives.

The people of this country, Mr. President, will never admit the claim of Great Britain, or any other power, as a matter of right, to stop and examine their vessels on the high seas, in time of peace, in any case, or under any pretext whatever. They cannot be reconciled to a demand, thus imperious in its character and dangerous in its consequences, by the promise of reparation and indemnity in case of mistake and consequential injury. They have not forgotten that a similar inducement was held out to a recognition of the odious claim of impressment, and how that proposition was answered by their Government. Mr. Monroe, as Secretary of State, was instructed to communicate the views of the American Government upon it, in the following terms, to our plenipotentiaries for treating of peace:

"It has been suggested, as an expedient for the adjustment of this controversy, that British cruisers should have a right to search our vessels for British seamen; but that the commanders thereof should be subjected to penalties in case they made mistakes, and took from them American citizens. By this, the British Government would acquire the right of search for seamen, with that of impressing from our vessels the subjects of all other powers. It will not escape your attention, that, by admitting the right in any case, we give up the principle, and leave the door open to every kind of abuse. The same objection is applicable to any and every other arrangement which withholds the respect due to our flag, by not allowing it to protect the crew sailing under it."

The same considerations are equally conclusive against the admission of a right on the part of British cruisers, in any case, and under any promise of contingent indemnity, to board and detain American vessels, whose nationality may be questioned, in time of peace. I can hardly persuade myself that the British Government has yet realized to itself the startling magnitude of this new claim of maritime police. If they have the right to ascertain, by visit and examination, the genuineness of every flag which their cruisers may encounter on the high seas, do they not, in effect, revive and extend to the whole ocean the obsolete claim of sovereignty and dominion which they formerly asserted within the narrow sea surrounding their own island. Every right has, too, its corresponding remedies. If British cruisers have the right to visit and detain all flags they meet on the ocean, to satisfy themselves, by personal examination, of their genuineness,—they might enforce that right, in case of any attempt to resist or evade it on the part of the vessels sought to be visited, by the summary naval remedies of capture and confiscation. This is the settled maritime law, in regard to the right of search of neutral vessels in time of war. If a neutral vessel attempt to resist or escape from the exercise of the right of search, she, by that fact alone, subjects herself to capture and condemnation as lawful prize. The same consequence would analogically attend the right of visit claimed by Great Britain in time of peace, if it exist (as she contends it does) under the law of nations; and a vessel on the high seas, conscious of the integrity of its flag, and unwilling to submit to the indignity and vexation of an inquisitorial visit from a British cruiser, might find herself punished for her contumacy, by a speedy capture, followed by a sentence of condemnation in a British admiralty court.

* The language of Admiral Sir Charles Napier, in the House of Commons, on the 2d of February last, when the subject of the American treaty was under discussion, may serve as an admonition of the necessity of looking to what may seem to be even remote consequences, in the treatment of these delicate questions of maritime law. In the London Times of the 3d ult., he is reported to have said, while strongly condemning the treaty, that "Lord Ashburton ought to have stated to the Government of the United States that we would never depart from the right of taking British seamen out of American ships."

The wise and enlightened statesmen of England cannot but feel that an innovation like this upon the established law of nations, in this, the nineteenth century—involving, as its natural corollary, consequences so startling—would, by a necessary instinct of self-preservation, unite all the other maritime powers of the world in one firm confederacy against them, for the protection of their common rights. I trust in the influence of reflections such as these, joined to that sober spirit of practical moderation which has thus far favorably distinguished the present public councils of Great Britain, to insure the continuance of general peace. In the maintenance of peace and harmony between England and America, there are so many reciprocal interests of the highest importance involved, commercial, moral, and political, that nothing can be wanted but a calm and collected temper on the part of the constituted authorities of both countries, unmoved by those general denunciations on the one side and the other—which are, unfortunately, but too well fitted to inflame national animosities—to bring to a safe and satisfactory termination every remaining question between them.

SPEECH OF MR. MILLER,
OF NEW JERSEY.

In Senate, February 17, 1843—On the bill to restore to General Jackson the fine imposed upon him by the district court of the United States in Louisiana.

Mr. PRESIDENT: The professed object of this bill is to refund to General Jackson a fine of $1,000, imposed upon him by the district court of the United States in Louisiana, on the 31st day of March, 1815, for certain contempts committed by him against that court.

Although this be the humble design of the bill—the mere settlement of a private claim—there has been thrown around it an unusual degree of interest and feeling. It has been magnified into a public measure, and is pressed upon our consideration as if it were a great national concern. The political parties of the day are taking sides upon this measure; politicians are making a hobby of it; State Legislatures have passed resolutions instructing their Senators to vote for the bill; and even the President of the United States has deemed it his duty to bring this matter before Congress, under that clause of the Constitution which authorizes him to give information of the state of the Union. Thus, sir, has this private bill been withdrawn from the great vortex of neglected claims, and magnified into a public measure, and glorified into an affair that concerns the state of the Union.

The urgency with which this matter is pressed, is not very complimentary to our sense of equal rights. There are many poor claimants, who, for years past, have been urging Congress to decide upon their claims, and who have gone down to their graves bankrupt through our inaction; yet no sooner is this claim presented, than our Justice tears the bandage from her eyes; and, beholding the hero of New Orleans, thrusts aside every other claim, and proceeds, with timid and nervous haste, to comply with his demand.

The notoriety which has been given to this claim, the various and powerful collateral influences which have been brought to its aid, induce me to pause and examine more carefully the merits of this bill.

Neither the political influence nor the military renown which surround the character of the distinguished applicant, shall induce me to regard this claim with more complacency than I would look upon the petition of the poorest man or the most humble soldier that ever served his country.

I wish to confine myself to the simple facts of the case, and upon them, and them alone, to decide this matter. All that has been said about the glorious victory of New Orleans—the services, civil and military, of General Jackson—ought not to affect this matter. They form no part of the facts of the case, and should, therefore, have no influence upon the judgment of the Senate. General Jackson himself discards all these collateral matters, and puts his claim upon the ground that the sentence imposed upon him by Judge Hall was illegal and unjust. I read from his letter, dated Hermitage, August 1, 1842, directed to Jacob Gibson, esq.:

"DEAR SIR: I have the pleasure to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 19th ultimo, informing me that a joint resolution passed the Legislature of New Hampshire, at their June session, 1842, of which you are a member, instructing your Senators in Congress, and requesting your Representatives, to use their efforts to procure the passage of a law, by Congress, to refund to me, with interest, the fine imposed by Judge Hall, in 1815, for an alleged contempt, &c.

"For this unsolicited interposition of the Legislature of New Hampshire to have expunged from the record this iniquitous imputation upon my character, by that unjust and vindictive Judge Hall, sitting in his own cause, from whose fiat there was no appeal, it deserves, as it receives, my sincere thanks."

If I could be satisfied that this sentence was iniquitous or unjust; or, even if legal, yet, if it were imposed upon General Jackson for an act required by the honest discharge of his official duties,—I would, without hesitation, vote to refund the fine: for I hold it to be the duty of every Government to sustain its public servants in the honest discharge of their duties; and, although they may occasionally mistake the law, yet, if that were an honest mistake, I would not punish the agent, but rather let the consequence fall upon the principal—the Government—for whose benefit the act was perpetrated.

Upon these acknowledged principles, let us examine the case. In the first place, we have before us the record of the proceedings and the sentence, certified under the seal of the court. By this record, it appears that General Jackson was regularly summoned, heard, tried, and condemned, in and by one of the district courts of this Government, for contempt of court, and fined in the sum of $1,000. It is also admitted that the General submitted to the judgment of the court, and paid the fine; and the judgment still remains of record, having been acquiesced in by the complainant from that time to this—a period of twenty-eight years.

In ordinary cases, we might here say to the claimant, "you are estopped by this record, and by your acquiescence in its truth for the space of nearly thirty years." It is true that the Government never pleads the statute of limitations, yet there are cases in which the lapse of time becomes a material and substantial matter of defence. The death of the actors in the scene, the forgetfulness of the living, may deprive the case of many of its essential facts. If the State should derive no advantage from time, neither should the applicant be permitted to lay by until death has silenced his adversary, or until some new adventitious circumstance has popularized his claim.

But, sir, I am willing to forego all these considerations, and to look behind this record, and examine the facts upon which it is founded.

What are these facts? On the evening of the 5th of March, 1815, about two months after the battle of New Orleans, Mr. Morel, a counsellor at law, called at the house of Judge Hall, and presented to him a petition to issue a writ of habeas corpus in behalf of Louis Louallier, who, as said, was held in illegal imprisonment under the order of General Jackson. The judge, after reading the petition, and swearing Mr. Morel as to the truth of the facts therein stated, endorsed upon the petition the following order:

'Let the prayer of the petition be granted, and the petitioner be brought before me at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning."

At the time of granting this order, Judge Hall stated to Mr. Morel "that he thought it would be proper for him to write a letter to General Jackson, to inform him that the writ had been awarded." Mr. Morel then states that he carried the order to the clerk of the district court, and then went to his office, where he wrote the letter intimated by the Judge, of which the following is a copy:

"To his Excellency Major General Jackson.

"SIR: I have the honor to inform your excellency that, as counsel, I have made application to his honor Dominick A. Hall, judge of the district court of the United States, for a writ of habeas corpus in behalf of Mr. Louallier, who conceived that he was illegally arrested by order of your excellency; and that the said writ has been awarded, and is returnable to-morrow, 6th inst., at 11 o'clock, a. m.

"I have the honor to be your excellency's most humble and obedient servant, P. L. MOREL, Counsellor at Law."

As soon as General Jackson read this letter, as it appears by the affidavits of Mr. Duplessis and Colonel Arbuckle, he issued the following order:

"HEADQUARTERS 7TH MILITARY DISTRICT,
"NEW ORLEANS, March 5, 1815—7 o'clock, p. m.

"Having received proof that Dominick A. Hall has been aiding and abetting and exciting mutiny within my camp, you will forthwith order a detachment to arrest and confine him, and report to me as soon as arrested. You will be vigilant; the agents of our enemy are more numerous than was expected. You will be guarded against escapes.

"ANDREW JACKSON,
Major General commanding.

"Lt. Col. ARBUCKLE, 3d Infantry."

At about eight o'clock of the evening of the same 5th of March, a detachment of sixty armed men, under the command of Major Butler, were seen marching hastily through the streets of New Orleans; they entered the dwelling of Judge Hall, forcibly arrested him, and conveyed him to the military barracks, where he was held a prisoner until the 11th of March, when General Jackson ordered him to be removed out of the city, as appears from the following order:

"HEADQUARTERS 7TH MILITARY DIVISION,
"NEW ORLEANS, March 11, 1815.

"SIR: You will detail from your troop a discreet non-commissioned officer and four men, and direct them to call on the officer commanding the 3d United States infantry for Dominick A. Hall, who is confined in the guard-house for exciting mutiny and desertion within the encampment of the city.

"Upon the receipt of the prisoner, the non-commissioned officer will conduct him up the coast, beyond the lines of General Carroll's encampment, deliver him the enclosed order, and set him at liberty. By command:

"THOS. BUTLER, Aid de-camp.

"Capt. P. V. OGDEN,
Commanding troop of cavalry, New Orleans."

From these facts it appears—

1. That the only act committed by Judge Hall, previous to his arrest, was the granting an order for a writ of habeas corpus, upon the sworn petition of a citizen, alleging that he was illegally imprisoned.

2. That for this act, and this alone, Gen. Jackson ordered the person of the Judge to be seized and imprisoned.

3. That the object of this arrest was to defeat the writ of habeas corpus.

I say that the only act charged upon Judge Hall was the order, "Let the prayer of the petitioner be granted." There is not a particle of evidence to be collected from the record, from the affidavits made by the several actors in the same, or from the various statements made by General Jackson himself, charging upon the Judge any other cause of offence than this. General Jackson did not even wait for the consummation of the order; but, as soon as he read the courteous note from Mr. Morel, informing him that an application had been made for a habeas corpus, the order for arrest was forthwith issued and put in force. It is true that, in the order for the arrest of Judge Hall, General Jackson states that he had received proof "that Dominick A. Hall had been aiding and abetting and exciting mutiny in his camp."

Now, sir, I ask for this proof. Can any of the friends of General Jackson point it out? Can they name the witness, living or dead, who has ever stated a fact implicating Judge Hall in the high crime charged in that order? General Jackson speaks of proof—not allegation, hearsay, or surmise. Surely, no honorable man, respecting the rights and liberties of his fellow-citizens, would ever venture, not only to make a charge like this against a highly respectable functionary, but to condemn him unheard, without having plenary evidence of his guilt. Yet, when we examine the facts of this case, we find that the only proof upon which Gen. Jackson acted was the letter of Mr. Morel, informing him that Judge Hall had granted an order for a writ of habeas corpus. This was the proof that Judge Hall had been abetting and exciting mutiny. The awarding of a writ of habeas corpus declared to be a proof of a mutinous act; the performing a constitutional duty converted into a crime; the great bulwark of human liberty struck down at a blow, and made the cause of oppression and imprisonment! Does the record of any court, civil or military, upon the face of the earth, present an example of an arrest of a freeman, upon proof like this?

After reading that peremptory order for the arrest, I confess that I felt anxious, for the sake of General Jackson, and for the honor of the country, to find some additional fact—even a circumstance—that might afford some excuse for a proceeding so bold and arbitrary; but I have searched in vain. No other proof can be found. And the case stands now as it did on the 5th of March, 1815—a Judge arrested and imprisoned for mutiny, upon proof that he had granted an order for a writ of habeas corpus!

I now proceed to show that General Jackson's object in arresting the Judge was to defeat the writ of habeas corpus. This is an important point, involving a mighty principle, deeply affecting the liberty of the citizen and the supremacy of the laws and the Constitution of the country.

If it should appear, from the investigation of this case, that the arrest of Judge Hall was not for inciting mutiny, as alleged in General Jackson's order, nor necessary to the defence of New Orleans, as his friends insist, but an unnecessary, arbitrary act, perpetrated for the purpose of harassing or overawing the officers of justice in the performance of a high constitutional duty,—it will present such a glaring case of outrage and wrong as none can venture to justify, and few, I hope, be found to excuse.

Upon this point also depends, in a great measure, the authority of the judge to proceed for the contempt of court. The question is this: Did General Jackson imprison Judge Hall for the purpose of preventing any further proceeding by the court upon the writ? Let us examine the facts carefully.

The order for the writ was granted on the evening of the 5th of March; Mr. Morel carried this order to the clerk the same evening, and wrote immediately to General Jackson the letter which I have already read to the Senate. This letter first informed General Jackson of the writ; and upon this information, and this alone, he ventured to issue the order for the arrest at 7 o'clock the same evening. This appears from the affidavit of Mr. Claiborne, the clerk of the court, in which he states that, in the evening of the same 5th of March, he called upon the General, in company with the marshal, Mr. Duplessis, and others:

"The General showed me a letter he had received from Mr. Morel, the counsel of Mr. Louallier, informing him (the General) that a writ of habeas corpus had issued in the case of Mr. Louallier."

This witness further says, that in the course of time he was with General Jackson; and the conversation turning upon Judge Hall, the General observed—

"That he had no personal prejudices against the Judge; but that his conduct in the instance in question had brought him under the cognizance of his (the General's) general order; that this was his (the General's) camp, and that no person or power must or should be over him in it."

But, sir, there is still stronger proof upon this point. General Jackson, in his letter of the 23d December, 1842, says:

"On the subject of Louallier's arrest, it should be known that he secreted himself from the issuing of the order for his arrest until he had made arrangements with Judge Hall for the habeas corpus; and when arrested and delivered to the colonel of the provost guard, being told that I had given directions for his good treatment, he replied, with thanks, that it was unnecessary, as he would be there but a short time. He was asked why? His reply was, that Judge Hall had issued a writ of habeas corpus for him, on which Colonel Arbuckle wrote to me asking advice. I directed him to keep the prisoner as long as he could wield a bayonet, unless he was liberated by my order. Having made inquiry into the matter, and found that Hall had so issued the writ, I forthwith gave orders for the arrest of Dominick A. Hall, and sent Captain Butler, of South Carolina, and Dr. Wm. Butler, with a file of men, for that purpose."

General Jackson's determination to defeat this writ does not stop with the arrest of the Judge. He had been informed that an original order for the writ had been made by the Judge, and filed with the clerk of the court. Fearing that this order might in some way interfere with his purpose, the General, at about 9 o'clock in the evening, sends one of his aids (Major Chotard) with a written order to the clerk, requiring him to give up the original order of the Judge. The clerk refuses to comply, but consents to accompany Major Chotard to the General's quarters; when the following scene took place, which I will permit the clerk to describe in his own language:

"The General showed me a letter he had received from Mr. Morel, the counsel of Mr. Louallier, informing him (the General) that a writ of habeas corpus had issued in the case of Louallier. I told the General that the writ had not issued; he asked me for the reason. I answered, because the marshal had told me he would not serve it on the Sabbath; and that it being returnable at 11 o'clock on Monday, I thought it would be time enough to issue it in the morning. The General asked me if I intended to issue it? I said that it was my duty to do so, and that it would issue. At this the General handed me a printed paper, which he said was his general order, and observed that that order would show me he would do his duty also. The General asked me for the original order of Judge Hall before mentioned. It was written on the back of Mr. Louallier's petition, and I handed the General the paper. The General read the order, and also the affidavit of Mr. Morel, which was at the foot of the petition, and observed to me that the dates of both the order and the affidavit had been altered, and asked what all this juggling was about? I assured him there was no juggle, and the reason of an alteration in the dates was as I have stated above. The General mentioned to me he should keep the paper in his own possession. I observed to him that there was an order of court that no original paper should be delivered out of the office. The General said he should keep it under his own responsibility; that it should be safely preserved, and that he would give me a certified copy of it; which he did."

Here it is important to observe, that, prior to this interview, General Jackson was under the impression that the writ had issued. He was led into this mistake by the letter from Mr. Morel, stating that the writ had been awarded. As soon as the clerk informs him that the writ had not been issued, but was still under the control of the clerk, the General, with all that military quickness peculiar to his character, perceives that the writ is still at large. This new difficulty must be overcome; and he forthwith sets to work like a hero to strangle the writ in the hand of the clerk. "The General," says the clerk, "asked me if I intended to issue it. I said that it was my duty to do so, and that I would issue it. At this, the General handed me a printed paper, which, he said, was his 'general order;' and observed that that order would show me that he intended to do his duty also."

Failing, by this threat, to intimidate the clerk from issuing the writ, the General next proceeds, by stratagem hardly to be justified even by the arbitrary rules of martial law, to obtain possession of the original petition and order. At the request of the General, the clerk hands him the paper to read; he refuses to return it, although the clerk urges upon him the rule of the court, "that no original paper should be delivered out of the office." He replies that he will keep it under his own responsibility; and then despatches the clerk with a copy of his own record, the original remaining in the pocket of General Jackson. But, sir, the case does not stop here. The General understood, from this interview with the clerk, that, although he had stopped the Judge, and pocketed the order, the writ would, nevertheless, issue. He therefore turns to the marshal, (who was present with the clerk at this interview,) and, after remarking that he had stopped the Judge, said "that he would treat any person who might improperly meddle with his camp in the same manner that he had treated the Judge." The marshal further testifies, that it was manifest, from the whole tenor of the conversation, that the General intended to disregard the writ.

These several acts on the part of General Jackson; the sudden arrest of the Judge between the test and return of the process; the attempt to suppress the writ by intimidating the clerk; the surreptitious manner of obtaining possession of the record; the threatening language to the marshal, and the utter disregard of the writ itself, can admit of but one construction. They prove, beyond all doubt, the settled purpose of General Jackson to defeat, by means of tyrannical and irresistible force, the legal operation of the habeas corpus. And most thoroughly did he succeed in his purpose; for he demolished the court, bullied its officers, carried off its records, and trampled beneath his feet, as so much blank paper, its record and seal.

By way of excusing these arbitrary proceedings—for no one even attempts to justify them—it is said that they were necessary to the military defence of New Orleans. I might here show, by incontestable evidence that the city at this time needed no extraordinary defence; that the enemy, defeated and routed by the battle of the 8th of January, had retired from the city, and were not to be found within one hundred and fifty miles; that, in fact, the war was over and peace declared, and known in New Orleans; and the city, on the 5th of March, could have been safely defended by the same band of sixty armed soldiers who expended their military ardor in storming the house and arresting the body of Judge Hall. All this, however, is irrelevant to the present inquiry. Could any state of things, militant or peaceful, an enemy present or absent, a siege or a blockade, a victory or a defeat—could any emergency of war render necessary to the defence of a city that a judge should be imprisoned for the peaceful act of granting an order for a writ of habeas corpus?

Is there anything in that act which could possibly affect the defence of a city? Could the imprisonment of Judge Hall add to the strength of ramparts? Would its battlements be enlarged, or its towers strengthened, by the incarceration of his body? Were the seizure of the record and the duress of the clerk necessary military movements of defence?

This writ was directed to General Jackson, and upon him it was served; he had the custody of the person for whose benefit it issued, and it was within his option either to have the body before the Judge, according to the command of the writ, or to return that the safety of the city required the retention of the prisoner. If he had taken the latter course, we might then with propriety discuss the other question which has been agitated here, (but which is, in my opinion, irrelevant to the case,)—the legality of the imprisonment of Mr. Louallier. But, sir, he determines to take neither of these courses. Not satisfied with disobeying the writ and detaining the prisoner, and with neglecting to give any excuse or reason for the detention, he imprisoned the Judge also. The only excuse General Jackson could allege for disobeying the writ, was the urgent necessity of retaining his custody over Louallier: having determined to retain him, his whole object was accomplished. Where was the necessity of taking the other step? Assuming supreme power, under what he called martial law, over all the civil authorities, and surrounded by a victorious army obedient to his will, Louallier was as secure under his custody after as before the issuing of the writ of habeas corpus. The imprisonment of Louallier could not be rendered less secure by the liberty of Judge Hall. Where, then, I ask, was the necessity for this wanton and cruel act of oppression? Neither the safety of the city nor the security of the prisoner required it; and the only reason that can be assigned for this proceeding is the one I have named—an arbitrary determination on the part of General Jackson to defeat any further proceeding upon the habeas corpus.

The minority report, which accompanies this bill, does not, in my opinion, touch the true point in this case. That report merely attempts to excuse and justify General Jackson for the arrest and detention of Mr. Louallier. It says not a word about the arrest of the Judge, nor offers the slightest apology for the contempt offered to the court. The question is stated in the report as follows:

"This question, however, having been introduced by the committee, the undersigned submits, that, in time of war and of imminent public danger, it may be the duty of the commander to arrest those regarded as traitors, spies, or mutineers, within the limits of his camp—especially in cases where it was obvious to him that his refusal to exercise such power would involve the disbanding of his forces, the defeat of his army, and the surrender of that army, and of the country which he was bound to defend. The alternative, as he fully believed, was to make the arrest or the abandonment of his country's standard, and the surrender of one of her greatest cities to a powerful enemy, whose motto of victory involved indiscriminate plunder and licentious outrage. Under such circumstances, should he make the arrest and save the country? To this question there will be but one response from the heart of every true American patriot."

Now, sir, as one of the American people, my heart fully responds to the sentiment, that, in time of war and of imminent public danger, it may be the duty of the commander to arrest traitors, spies, and mutineers, within the limits of his camp. I would even go further, and excuse the General for hanging traitors and spies under such circumstances. But we must not confuse the innocent with the guilty, the patriot with the traitor, even to add to the honor and glory of General Jackson. Was Judge Hall a traitor, or a spy, or a mutineer? Is there a fact or a circumstance, stated in that report, or anywhere else, implicating him in either of these high crimes? The imprisonment of Louallier, the circumstances under which it was made, and the reasons for its continuance, are distinct matters from the imprisonment of Judge Hall: the former may be excused, and even justified, without at all affecting the legality of the latter. May not a man be legally imprisoned, and yet a judge be permitted to grant a writ of habeas corpus, to inquire into the cause of his duress, without subjecting himself to the penalties of the crime which rests upon the prisoner?

'The law (says this report) which justified this act was the great law of self-defence: it was the law of necessity."

What act? The arrest of Judge Hall? No. The honorable gentleman who made the report does not mean that arbitrary proceeding. He could find no necessity so urgent, no self-defence so pressing, as to legalize, under any code of law, civil or martial, an act so destructive to personal security and civil liberty.

Did these several acts on the part of General Jackson amount to a contempt of court? To answer this question satisfactorily, we must ascertain what constitutes this offence. The best authorities in the law describe it as follows:

"A contempt is a disobedience to the court, or an opposing or despising the authority, justice, or dignity thereof. It commonly consists in a party's doing otherwise than he is enjoined to do, or not doing what he is commanded or required by the process, order, or decree of the court. Sometimes it arises by one or more, their opposing or disturbing the execution or service of the process of the court, or using force to the party that serves it; sometimes by using words importing scorn, reproach, or diminution of the court, its process, orders, officers, or ministers, upon executing such process or orders."

The authority to restrain and punish in a summary way acts of this nature, is essential to the existence of every court. It is part of the law of its judicial life necessary to its self-preservation. It is the right to resist or punish, on the spot, and without delay, any insult or act calculated to disturb or restrain its judicial action in a cause or proceeding depending. The law of contempt embraces the right to maintain the honor and order of the court; to protect its officers in the legal discharge of their duty; to preserve its records; or to defend its process and writs, in their service or return, against insult or violence.

If we deny to a court this power of self-protection, the obstinacy or the violence of any one man may at any moment stop the proceedings in a cause, bar the doors of your courts, and break up the administration of law and justice.

Was not that the result in the case before us? A legal proceeding had been commenced—a writ issued under the authority and seal of the court, and made returnable at a certain time and place. The object of the writ required that it should be executed with as little delay as possible; its purposes being to inquire into the cause of the imprisonment of a citizen, who alleged that he was illegally deprived of his liberty.

Now, sir, if a person, conscious that these proceedings are in progress, and desirous of defeating them, wrests from the hands of the clerk the order and petition upon which the proceedings are founded, and, between the test and return, seizes with armed force and imprisons the judge who issued the writ, and thus prevents him from being present to hear the parties on the return day, is he not guilty of a gross contempt? If this be not contempt of court, then, alas! are our courts beneath contempt.

This is, in fact, something more than a contempt. For a contempt is seldom so outrageous as to deprive the tribunal of its existence; but here the blow was so fierce and fatal, that the whole court, with all its functions and faculties, judicial, ministerial, and executive, together with its record, process, and seal—all fell paralyzed in death beneath the arm of the hero of New Orleans.

Thus far I have spoken only of the outrage to the Judge—of the contempt to the court. These, unjustifiable as they are, might have been excused by an indulgent and grateful people; but there is exposed by these proceedings a still deeper outrage, and a still higher contempt—an outrage against the Constitution, a contempt of the writ of habeas corpus. I could forgive much, in consideration of the military services of General Jackson; but who that reveres the institutions of his country can sanction a wanton breach of its Constitution? Who that loves liberty can excuse the blow that strikes down the bulwarks of its defence?

In the erection and maintenance of a Government founded upon liberty and law, principles, and sometimes things, are of more importance than men. Thousands of lives were sacrificed to obtain our Constitution. Our ancestors contended for years, amidst revolutions and persecutions in the field and in the Senate, for the establishment of that great instrument of English liberty—the writ of habeas corpus; and shall we, their descendants, yield both these proud trophies of patriotism to the insatiable ambition and craving vanity of one man? Gen. Jackson, in the vigor of his youth, was willing to sacrifice his life in defence of his country; and does he now, in old age, grudge a thousand pieces of silver, expended in vindication of a principle, deprived of which his country would not be worth defending?

Our fathers, mindful of the history of the writ of habeas corpus, and duly appreciating its importance in the protection of personal and civil liberty against the aggressions of arbitrary power, did, in and by the Constitution, secure the privilege of this writ to every American citizen in the following words:

"The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when, in cases of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it."

Mark the words, "the privilege of the writ"—a known right, a common prerogative, used and enjoyed by the people before and at the time of the adoption of the Constitution; and which that instrument does not grant, but merely preserves. The power to suspend this great common-law privilege is reserved to Congress, the Representatives of the people; and even then their control over it is limited to two emergencies—rebellion or invasion; and not even then, unless the public safety require it.

Of little value would be that constitutionally preserved privilege, if the power to suspend it is left in the hands of every commander in our army and navy, to be exercised according to his judgment or whim; neither the Executive, the commander-in-chief of the army and navy, the judge who issues the writ—no, not even the sovereign people, for whose benefit this privilege is reserved, have the power to suspend it; Congress, and Congress alone, can do it.

This is acknowledged by all. Yet we are told that there is a law superior to the Constitution—the law of war, called martial law! Do gentlemen mean to say that a declaration of war abrogates the Constitution? Was not our Constitution made for war as well as for peace? Is its potency only to be felt in the quiet unresisting times of peace, but lost amid the din of arms and shouts of victory? It would, indeed, be an ill-constructed instrument for the government of a free people, if it made no provision for the protection of the property, the liberty, and the life of a citizen at a time when all these rights demand the most efficient support, and require the most powerful protection.

But this martial law—what is it? What its definition? From whence does it proceed, and what are its limits?

This thing called martial law once had a kind of existence in England. It was felt, but not seen, dwelling in the dark corners of the star-chamber, seizing citizens in the darkness of the night, and dragging them off to be tried and executed by armed men; in its character, half military, half civil—a court-martial for trial of civil offences.

So ill-shapen, so monstrous, so undefinable was this law, that Judge Blackstone, who could, in one short sentence, define the municipal law of England, found himself utterly at fault in describing the martial law, and contents himself by telling us that it is the absence of all law. If I should undertake to define this law, it would be by reversing Judge Blackstone's definition of municipal law, to wit: "Martial law has no rule of action, does not proceed from the supreme power of the State, neither commanding what is right, nor prohibiting what is wrong."

If by this law is meant that code of laws which govern men in arms—the rules and regulations of an army and navy—we all understand it. But when you claim for this law a supremacy over the Constitution; when you extend its jurisdiction over the citizen—over the life, liberty, and property of the private individual, and subject him and all his rights to be dealt with according to the will or whim of a military commander—you present a monster, a tyrant, under whose government no freeman could live in safety for an hour.

General Jackson seems to have been under the impression that this constitutional privilege was only to be enjoyed in time of peace; that the writ of habeas corpus was a tame, quiet process, to be sent to county jails, and only obligatory upon sheriffs and turnkeys; but upon a major general, whose camp is a city, and whose only law is a camp order, enforced at the point of the bayonet! what avail parchments, writs, and paper constitutions? Shall the soldier yield to the civil marshal? Shall the general yield to the judge?

General Jackson forgot, at the time, the history of that writ. You, sir, know that it had its origin in war and civil commotion, when, under pretence of an urgent necessity and public safety, men were seized by armed soldiers, thrown into prison, and kept there, unheard and untried, by the mere mandate of the King.

That man Jenks, whose imprisonment was one of the immediate causes that produced the famous act of habeas corpus, was a citizen of London, on the popular or factious side. He was committed by the King in council, for a mutinous speech in Guildhall. The Chancellor, on an application for a habeas corpus, declined to issue it during the vacation; and the Chief Justice of the King's Bench made so many difficulties about issuing the writ, that Jenks lay in prison several weeks. This arbitrary imprisonment of an humble citizen of London excited the spirit of liberty throughout all England; and notwithstanding the mandate of the King in council, and the craven prevarication of the Chancellor and of the Chief Justice, the Commons of England never rested until they had secured by law an effectual remedy against any future outrage upon the liberty of the citizen. That remedy has, since that day, been sacredly preserved as a great landmark in the progressive advancement of civil liberty. It has been called the second Magna Charta of English rights. Our fathers brought it with them as a cherished jewel; they re-enacted it in every State Legislature; they embodied it in the Constitution of the Union; and there it now stands, stereotyped forever, in these words: "The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended."

From the time when the commons of England triumphed over the arbitrary martial-law power of the crown—from the day of the enactment of the habeas corpus, in the reign of Charles the Second—from the formation of our Constitution—through all the commotions, revolutions, and wars in England and in America—no King, no President, no popular military chieftain ever ventured to suspend, even for an hour, the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, until General Jackson, on the 5th of March, 1815, and in the 39th year of our independence, took upon himself the responsibility.

This case stands alone. For one hundred and fifty years has this writ been revered as the guardian spirit of human liberty, pursuing unmolested the even tenor of its way, commanding obedience from every authority, entering every prison, descending into every dungeon, and, through grated doors and arms of steel, bringing forth the prisoner, together with the cause of his imprisonment, to the light of day.

Now, sir, I ask, can we, the Senate of the United States, existing by and acting under the Constitution, excuse, and thereby justify, this suspension of the habeas corpus? No, sir; we cannot; we dare not. I would do anything for General Jackson rather than this. Erect monuments, make triumphal arches, build temples in honor of the glorious victory at New Orleans; but I cannot sacrifice a great constitutional principle—a principle more valuable to this people than a hundred cities, more glorious than a thousand victories.

Why is this measure urged upon Congress just at this time? After sleeping for a quarter of a century, this claim suddenly awakes, as by the touch of a magician's wand; the whole country becomes agitated with an anxious sense of justice, brooking no delay. The public treasure groans to be delivered of the fine money; and General Jackson and his friends can live no longer under the foul imputation of the sentence. Why this sudden outbreak of justice, gratitude, and sensibility? Were not all the facts of the case as well known twelve years ago, as they are at the present moment? Has delay advanced the validity of the claim? Has neglect aroused our gratitude? Has time made the outrage more glaring?

Passing over the eight years of General Jackson's administration, (during which a sense of delicacy might forbid action upon this subject,) how can we account for the silence of Mr. Van Buren, during the four years of his administration? Did his keen eye not perceive this stain upon the character of his great benefactor? Was his gratitude so obtuse that it could not give a word or a hint that the thing would be agreeable? Or was it that, having glory enough in those days, this little matter of the thousand dollars fine was laid by for a season of scarcity?

I believe I know that this measure has here and elsewhere many honest supporters. The honorable Senator from Missouri, who introduced the bill, has too much sincerity and honesty of character ever to advocate a measure here which he does not believe to be right and just. Yet, sir, from all that I have seen and heard, I cannot divest myself of the impression that a certain aspirant to the Presidency is attempting, through this measure, to use once more the name and influence of Gen. Jackson to obtain a second time the object of his ambition. Having once been warmed and illuminated by the meridian influences of his glorious predecessor, he has, during a short eclipse, been examining with telescopic accuracy, the clouded face of the great luminary, to discover, if he could, some little spot from which might be elicited a solitary ray of reflected glory.

In order to get at this little matter of glorification, the life and history of the old hero have been conned over to find, if possible, some dubious point of official conduct—some unjustified act—some unvarnished spot, a vanity not satisfied, an insult unavenged; and, at last, this matter of the fine is fixed upon as an offensive object in the picture, and we are called upon to varnish it over by legislative enactment. Let me say to the friends of Gen. Jackson, you are not true limners; you will spoil the painting by this varnish. It is these rough points and dark shades that give character and individuality to the picture. Smooth them down, or gild them over, and it will no longer be a true likeness of your responsibility-taking hero. It is better for all parties that we leave this matter as the history of the times records it. Let the controversy between the civil and military power—between the General and the Judge—remain settled as it is by the record. It is well settled, and we cannot alter it if we would. The hero General met the hero Judge in sharp conflict; the General imprisoned the Judge, and the Judge fined the General; the one lost his liberty, the other his money. We cannot now readjust the matter upon equal terms. You may gratify the feelings of General Jackson by returning this fine; but what becomes of the outrage upon the Judge? Is there no sympathy for his wrongs? Dragged from his house by armed men; marched through the public streets; branded with crime; the object of scorn and contempt; imprisoned, and then banished as an outlawed traitor—his wrongs have never been redressed. He went down to his grave an injured and insulted man, long to be remembered for his unequal contest with the hero of New Orleans. Not so with General Jackson. This petty fine, this sentence of contempt, now remembered by him with so much soreness, was unheeded at the time, amidst the shouts of his triumph; and was, for a while, forgotten, in the enjoyment of those high honors bestowed upon him by his grateful country. Yet his friends are not satisfied. The record of this sentence is still in existence. After twenty-eight years of glory won and enjoyed in other fields, they now propose to conduct their hero, with all Congress in his train, back to the first field of his triumph, New Orleans; not to celebrate his victory over the enemies of his country, but rather to sanction his triumph over the laws and Constitution of our Republic; and the grand ceremony of this fête will be to tear in fragments, over the grave of Dominick A. Hall, this record—the only monument left us of an independent and upright judge. I, for one, will have no part in the pageant.

SPEECH OF MR. BARNARD,

OF NEW YORK,

In the House of Representatives, February 20, 1843—In Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the bill reported from the Committee of Ways and Means in relation to treasury notes.

Mr. BARNARD offered to add to that bill, by way of amendment, the substance of a bill laid on the table some time since by him, and printed, and which, at the time, he had proposed to offer as a substitute for the exchequer bill of the Select Committee on the currency, (Mr. CUSHING's bill,) whenever that bill should be taken up. Mr. BARNARD's bill, now offered as an amendment to the treasury note bill, was entitled "A bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to borrow a sum of money, not exceeding fifteen millions of dollars, of State banks, and to adopt an equal amount of currency, which shall be receivable in payment of Government dues."

This amendment having been received—

Mr. BARNARD addressed the committee to the following effect:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: On the whole, sir, I do not know that any more fit occasion for bringing forward the provisional measure on the subject of the currency which I have had the honor to propose, could well be presented, than that which is now offered; and I have felt obliged, therefore, to decline the appeal made to me by my friend, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. FILLMORE,] that I would forbear to press this measure at the present time. I must insist on embracing this occasion to discharge myself of a great public duty; and, having a very distinct notion of what this House owes to the country on the subject which I have now brought to its notice, I am not disposed to let this opportunity slip of exacting from it some action in regard to that subject. It will not do to say that my bill is not germane to the subject before the committee. The two subjects are intimately related. Nor will the plea of lack of time avail anything. If there is time to perpetuate an issue of twelve millions of treasury notes, for the relief of the treasury—which is what the bill of the Ways and Means proposes—there is time to consider a proposition for changing the form of that indebtedness—which is what my bill proposes, with the advantage of supplying to the country, by means of that change of form, what the country now so much needs, and so imperatively demands—an ample, and a safe, sound, and uniform national currency. It will not do to say, as we have heard said and repeated this morning, that the public business must first be done—as if there were no other public business than the passing of appropriation bills, and bills to issue or perpetuate treasury notes. Sir, this which I propose is public business, and public business of some consequence too; and, if gentlemen are not sensible of the fact now, they may be made so, perhaps, when our common master, the people, come to reckon with us on the subject. In the condition in which the monetary and business affairs of this Government and of this country now are, and have been for a considerable period, no one thing can be named of such indispensable necessity as the restoration of a sound and uniform national currency. It is the vital air to the body politic—an indispensable requisite to its healthy existence. It may, in my opinion, be now, at once, procured and restored, by a very simple and a very safe financial measure, which, for itself, and without reference to the matter of currency, is strongly demanded by the condition of the treasury.

The bill of the Ways and Means is professedly a bill for the relief of the treasury; and it proposes that relief through the old mode (become so hackneyed within the last six years) of treasury notes. This is the ready resort and panacea prescribed in these latter times, for all the distempers of our exhausted exchequer. Whenever this abused patient of ours—victim, as he has been, of alternate plethora and inanition—shows symptoms of collapse or syncope, forthwith he is to be blown up, like a bladder, with treasury notes. Treasury notes are his hartshorn and his lavender; they have recovered him from many a heart-sickness and deadly swoon, within the last six years; and it is really surprising how their virtues hold out, considering how frequently, and almost constantly, they have been resorted to and applied. Sir, I have never yet, I believe, voted for a treasury-note bill. I might do so, without any direct violation of conscience or principle, if I could see a proper case or exigency for a measure of the sort. They might be used, as exchequer bills are used in England, to anticipate incoming revenue; but they ought not to be lightly resorted to, to take the place of revenue, or as a mode of borrowing for the support of Government, especially in time of peace. They have now been thus employed for almost six years uninterruptedly. They were so used by the last Administration, against which we Whigs earnestly remonstrated; and, coming into legislative power, we Whigs have adopted and continued the practice—with how much more urgent necessity on our part, the country will determine. And it is now proposed to employ still further this means of raising the wind for the treasury; it is proposed to give authority to the treasury to reissue the whole batch of treasury notes now outstanding—some twelve millions of dollars, more or less—as they may be paid in for dues, or come in for redemption. The greater part are already past due, and do not come in for payment, only because we have added to our promise to pay interest on them till due—which was the footing on which they originally stood—a promise to pay interest on them till redeemed. And it is proposed by this bill to add the like promise in regard to the rest and residue of the outstanding notes. Sir, I do not like this Jeremy-Diddler way of supporting this Government. These notes, every one of them, were issued payable in one year from date, and it concerned the credit and honor of the Government that they should have been promptly met at maturity. This subsequent promise of paying interest, to prevent the holders from demanding payment of the principal—this purchase, in market overt, of the lenity and forbearance of our creditors—is not the sort of transaction that I, for one, can take any pride in, as an American citizen. If the Government unhappily could do no better, why, very well; and I hope there has been more actual necessity for this sort of proceeding than I have been able to discover. At any rate, coming, as the renewed proposition does, from the Committee of Ways and Means, I shall not set myself up against it; though it must be carried, if at all, by other votes than mine. I have not moved to strike out the bill of the Ways and Means, and substitute mine for it; I propose my bill as an amendment, to be added to theirs; they will consist very well with each other in the same enactment. If my plan should chance to be adopted, and then it should be found that the State banks should refuse to lend us money on the terms proposed, the treasury would still have the treasury notes to resort to; while, on the other hand, if the banks should assent to our terms and lend us the money, there would not only be no necessity for any reissue of treasury notes, but all the outstanding notes might be promptly redeemed. The bill of the Ways and Means is, as I have said, a bill for the relief of the treasury. So is mine; and, I venture to think, much the more important and necessary bill of the two, not only for the relief of the treasury, but for the relief of the country also.

But, Mr. Chairman, I am free to confess—indeed, I wish it to be understood—that my main purpose is to procure, by the plan I propose, a currency of national import and character for the country. This is the great want of the country. Upon this question, more than any other, the political revolution of 1840 turned. The Whig party came into power upon the solemn promise and pledge to give the country a sound national currency. The general expectation was, that this was to be done by means of a bank of the United States. The mode, however, was not so much dwelt upon; it was the object and the thing that was chiefly discussed, promised, and expected. The local currencies were in the most deranged condition; the utmost confusion reigned in the exchanges; the regular flow of business was obstructed and interrupted in all its channels. There was stagnation, and distress, and ruin everywhere. It was universally felt that the process of restoration must begin at Washington. It was this Federal Government which had brought on all this mischief, by its unhallowed war on the best currency the world ever saw, and which had then coolly turned its back on the confusion and desolation it had created, and declared that it did not belong to this Government to have anything to do with currency and exchanges. The demand of the people was, that it should have something to do with this subject; and that demand was uttered with the voice of authority, and in tones of thunder. They called on the name of the Whig party, which they clothed with the ensigns of political power, and commanded them to go promptly to the work of relief and restoration. And we promised to do it. The country must have a sound and uniform national currency, and we promised that it should be supplied. This was the only way to bring order, regularity, and safety out of the confusion and rottenness which prevailed in the local currencies and in the exchanges; and we promised it should be done. Before God, and many a cloud of witnesses, we made this solemn engagement. There was one condition, and one only, annexed, by necessary implication, to this engagement. The mode of reaching and accomplishing the object must be in strict conformity to the Constitution, and to our own well-understood principles. We were not bound to violate either the Constitution or our own consciences; but we were bound to accomplish the object, only leaving these intact.

And, Mr. Chairman, never was a great duty entered upon with more alacrity, resolution, and zeal. Never was there a more honest endeavor to perform an honest undertaking and trust. An extra session of Congress was convened, and we went to work like men at the subject of the currency, though, in the mean time, we had lost the elected head and chief of our party and of the Administration. Still, we did not shrink from our duty and our engagements. At that period, nothing but a bank was thought of in any quarter, whether in Congress, at the Treasury Department, or at the Executive mansion. Various plans were suggested—to Congress, in Congress, and by the Executive; and they were all plans of banks. Nobody seemed then to think or dream of anything else. By common consent and agreement, at that period, the currency of the country was to be supplied and regulated through an incorporated national bank. Two attempts were made in Congress to establish such a bank; two such banks in succession were created, to neither of which would the President yield his assent; and it became, at last, apparent to everybody that he would yield his assent to nothing in the shape or similitude of an incorporated national bank. Thus ended at once all hopes of supplying a currency by means of a national bank for the term of Mr. Tyler's administration. It remained to be seen whether the same object could be accomplished through any other agency, which should be free from constitutional and other insuperable difficulties. Mr. Tyler and some of his advisers were of opinion it pose on the soft and plastic mind of his confiding Excellency the belief that New York writhes in the revolting embraces of the ultra Democracy, through the efforts of his faithful minister. I doubt it not. And I doubt not that, in the wassails of the palace, some insulated recess has often been vocal with the voices of the merry trio chanting hosannas to the conquerors of the Whig party and the despoilers of their country.

Sir, let them quaff on and sing on. The day of fearful retribution will soon come. Though now high in power, sparkling in its sunshine and revelling in its enjoyments, rest assured, sir, that their political "damnation slumbereth not." On the 4th day of March, 1845, by the common consent of all parties, they will be consigned to a political pandemonium, where, in the bosom of a restless and disappointed ambition, "the worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched."

Sir, amid all the gloom which treachery has thrown around the Whig party, I do not permit myself to doubt that its recuperative energies will marshal it to the field in 1844; and then, as in 1840, victory will again perch upon its standard. Let not the Locofoco legions "lay the flattering unction to their souls" that they are to have a bloodless field. No, sir; they shall have war—war tenus capulo, in all its honorable forms, and with all its consuming fierceness—and waged, too, with a spirit which would do honor to the most chivalric campaign of 1840.

Under the banner of patriotism, inscribed with the name of the honest, frank, fearless, and patriotic "Harry of the West"—associated, as I confidently trust it will be, with the name of a Northern gentleman well known to the country for his fearlessness, integrity, and indomitable spirit, and under which all opposed to the Robespierrean Democracy, be they old Whigs or new Conservatives, may rally—the Whig party will again take the field, and wage the war with the spirit and enthusiasm which characterized the triumphs in New York in 1838 and 1839, and the general triumph throughout the country in 1840. Under such a banner, and with such a spirit, we shall reconquer the laurels of which treachery has robbed us, and again attempt (and, under the auspices of a faithful President, successfully attempt) to raise the country from the horrible pit of Locofocoism, and place it on the rock of solid and enduring prosperity.

SPEECH OF MR. TALLMADGE,

OF NEW YORK,

In Senate, February 6, 1843.—On the exchequer.

The bill "amendatory of the several acts establishing the Treasury Department" being, on motion of Mr. TALLMADGE, taken up, he proceeded to address the Senate to the following effect, in explanation of the provisions of the bill:

Mr. T. regretted (he said) that he had not been able to bring forward this measure at an earlier period. The delay had not occurred on his own account, or through his instance, but had been yielded to the request of other Senators. Some two weeks since, it had been assigned a day under a special order. Meantime, however, came on the important debate (on the Oregon question) which has so much occupied the attention of the Senate. Until this—unexpectedly prolonged as it had been—was terminated, he had not chosen to distract the attention of the body by a double discussion. The Senate would pardon him this little preliminary vindication of himself against a possible imputation of remissness, or of disregard for his own voluntary pledges of bringing forward the measure anew at the earliest time in his power.

The general purpose of the bill (Mr. T. went on to say) is to do something for the country, as to currency and exchanges. Substantially, the bill is the same as that brought in last winter by report of that select committee of which I had the honor to be chairman. To the report then submitted with the bill, the Senate will allow me to refer them for those more amplified details and arguments which are less necessary now that the Senate is in possession of the general plan. I propose, at present, only to re-state those larger points of then measure, upon the soundness of which, and their competency for the object in view, the entire question must rest.

As, then, what is mainly proposed is to do something which may redeem the currency and exchanges of the country from their present wretched confusion, it is at least necessary, for the formality of a regular argument or investigation, to ask what would, in every other sense, be superfluous—whether the country at large stands in any vehement, any unusual need of such interposition, such exertion of any power applicable to the purposes in view as the Government may possess?

If the common disasters of a whole land ever challenged justice or pity from its rulers; if a desolation more widely spread, if less total, than any which the ravages of war ever inflicted, is a thing demanding public relief; if a general havoc of nearly all private fortune, and an overthrow of all public credit, are matters that call for some effort of the prudence or power of the whole community,—I may surely, in the unexampled distress which convulses the entire body politic, find enough to warrant me in saying that the need of doing something is terrible, and its delay inexcusable, if there is within the legitimate and safe resorts of our Government anything that can be done.

The condition of the country I will not attempt to describe. I am not master enough of the imagery of suffering and gloom to paint a picture of such various and such cruel calamity. Afflicting as it is to look upon, it is doubly painful from the strange, the violent, the dismal contrast which it offers with the youth, the strength, the customary prosperity of our country, and the teeming resources which vainly lie all around us. We are beggars in the midst of the most boundless natural wealth; we are starving in the midst of the unexhausted fertility of a soil capable of yielding us almost anything; and the profusest blessings of nature, and the highest boon of political freedom, seem, for the time, bestowed upon us equally in vain.

For all this there must be some adequate cause. Visibly to all eyes, it is the extreme and rapid reduction of the circulating medium—under the heavy individual and public engagements which an equally extreme previous inflation had given rise to—which has produced, and threatens greatly to prolong, all that we are suffering. Such (though not the sole) is certainly the great and leading cause of what, as politicians or statesmen, we must speak; because it is clearly to this cause that we must address ourselves, as to the only thing worthy of a statesman's thoughts, or a test of his skill—the possibility of a remedy.

I, sir, and those with whom I have generally concurred in political views, have (I repeat) felt satisfied that, though there may have been many causes for this state of things, yet the great and immediate one lies at present in the deranged condition of the currency and exchanges of the country. As to the origin of that derangement, there may be a diversity of opinion; but there can be none as to the existence of the fact, and little as to the powerful influence which it exerts in all that we are now witnessing.

Without question, it is one of the saddest and one of the most dangerous characteristics of party and of politics in this country, that, unscrupulous of everything but to strengthen their own momentary force, they seize, and endeavor to make a part of themselves, everything alike—no matter how little of a party nature, and no matter how much the prejudice to the public interests which may ensue from thus transforming many questions purely national into matters of partisan warfare. There is no subject which, in point of magnitude, in point of universality, and in point of being proper to trade alone, was less fit to be flung into the mere cockpit of party strife, than this of the currency. Yet, unfortunately for the country, the instant that it could be rendered anything that it should never have been—anything that it could never, with safety to the country, become—it was, from a commercial, turned into a political question—the mere watchword and battle-cry of conflicts with which such a simply commercial question should never have been mixed. It was not to the agitation of political passions, ever extreme and exaggerated in what for the moment occupies them, that such a question could be committed for any safe decision. As long as such questions are made the rallying call of party, derangement of the currency and exchanges will continue; and the consequent derangement of the whole business affairs of the community. It is surely time, amidst the extremity of distress into which this false and unhappy management of the question, has plunged us, to drop those party distinctions and think once more of the public sufferings around us, and the duty—if there be a possibility—of lightening or even relieving them, by a calm and a prudent legislation. In this great council, holding in its hands to such an extent the destinies of the entire nation, the first consideration should be, how best to fulfil what we owe to the country at large, now reduced to a condition too disastrous to be much longer endured. That condition, I hesitate not to say, in my judgment imperatively demands that we unite on some such measure of relief as that proposed by this bill. The time unhappily is past, when, unembarrassed by the difficulties which delay has thickened over the matter, we could, comparatively at our ease, have deliberated of measures and methods now no longer in our choice. Formerly we might, with a freedom to select from all that experience offered of good, have held calm counsel as to what was best: now, reduced to far sadder afflictions, and with a far narrower choice of modes of relief, we are left to ask not "what is best?" but "what is it now possible to do?" The people are crying aloud on all sides for relief. For that relief they turn their eyes, from all quarters of the country, to this Government. They ask you not for relief from their private, their individual misfortunes, which they know you cannot cure; but relief from a wretched condition of the circulation, which denies them all possibility of redeeming and retrieving their losses, and which you can cure. They ask you to give them, not an illegitimate and individual aid; but to afford to their private necessities the indirect assistance of what the public business as imperiously requires—a better mechanism of interchange, a sounder vehicle of their business and of your own. Such is demanded, not more by individual convenience than by the public interests. If, in the management of its own finances, the Government can, at the same time, furnish an element of exchange that will go far to give the country what it so much needs, and what seems so little attainable in any other way—a sound currency—is it not bound to do so?

Are gentlemen, then, to fold their arms and pronounce that nothing can be done? Here is at least a measure which will do something. It may not accomplish all that could be wished: but it will effect much. It cannot fail to afford to commerce a good and a general instrument, which it does not now possess: it must, to its entire extent, infuse into the circulation an element of correction and soundness; and these indirect but important effects as to private business will be but incidental results from a system of which the more immediate benefits accrue to the Government itself, as to the distribution and management of its receipts and disbursements.

In what it thus proposes, there is surely nothing that is not strictly compatible with the constitutional powers of the Government—with such powers, I mean, as are inseparable from its duty of the collection, safekeeping, and disbursement of the public revenues. If, in performing these functions, it can, at the same time, indirectly and incidentally afford to the business of the country facilities of exchange and currency which involve not a loss but a benefit in the public business itself, surely it is strongly its duty to do so. The provisions of this bill aim at nothing more.

It will, at all events, establish one great and fundamental principle—a principle which is the dividing line between the extremes of parties, and which lies at the bottom of all these systems, whether they present themselves in the shape of a national bank, an exchequer, or in any other form—namely, that it is the right and the duty of the General Government, in the collection and disbursement of its revenues, to aid in furnishing a uniform currency, and regulating the exchanges of the country. Much will have been achieved by the establishment of this great principle, and the foundation will be laid, on which a superstructure can be erected, with proportions regulated by the constitutional powers of the Government and the wants of the country.

Since the foundation of this Government, different methods of effecting this object of connecting the management of the public revenues with the regulation of the currency and exchanges have been tried. Of these, the earliest and much the longest preserved was a national bank. To it succeeded what was called the State bank deposite system. The sub-treasury, of still briefer existence, was the last-born of these expedients; but died (not a very promising child) in its infancy.

The oldest, and infinitely the most successful of these successive contrivances, dates almost from the undation of the present Government. It owed conception to the sagacity of the ablest man that er stood at the head of our national finances—lexander Hamilton; who, in 1791, recommended resort to such an institution as a remedy for the treme derangement then existing in our monetary d financial affairs. Its success answered admirably to the powerful judgment of him who had oposed it. Scarcely had it gone into existence, hen the confusion which it was meant to remedy ood rebuked. Order at once rose up out of the aos and embarrassment of the treasury, and undness out of the derangement of the circulaon. For twenty years, lending these advantages our moneyed system, it stood, the very capital the column of this great man's just fame. In 11, however, when its charter ran out, a set of publicans a good deal more righteous than George Vashington and the other patriots who founded e Government and this bank almost together, oted it anti-republican, and refused its re-charter. till, in that day, what called itself republicanism as not so wise as to scorn the most positive exerience, the clear demonstrations of actual fact; that when, after five years' trial of the fiscal and onstitutional advantages of being without a bank, ey found themselves, in 1816, involved anew in ll that financial confusion which had been so appily removed by the original creation of the ank, they, the republican opponents of that danerous institution, re-established it.

I need scarcely say, sir, that, as before, it lifted e finances and currency of the country out of the aire, where they were stuck; and gave us, until a ew political war was declared against it, a currency as perfect as any commercial country in the orld ever possessed. In spite, however, of these onspicuous benefits, and the manifest rashness of bandoning, for a more than questional experiment, system which had so admirably performed its reat and difficult functions, the country allowed itself once more to be hurried, by the all-powerful nfluence of a single great leader, into a fresh demolition of the bank, and a new essay of currency-nongering.

In accordance with the views of the party with which, from my first entrance into public life, I had cted, I myself, in 1831, was opposed to the re-harter of the bank. The Senate will pardon me f I repeat a little incident which occurred soon fter I took my seat in this body, and which my wn subsequent impressions have often served to ecall to my recollection. After an incidental iscussion on this subject, in which I had taken part, a distinguished Senator from Kentucky said to me: "Sir, there was a young man from the West in Congress in 1811; and he, upon the constitutional notions that are now governing you, voted against re-chartering the old United States Bank. Time rolled on, and troubles came. We attempted to get along without a national bank: but at last we found that without it we could not manage the public finances, nor maintain for the country a sound and uniform currency. That young man then became convinced by experience that the vote which he had given in 1811 was wrong; and in 1816 he gave his voice for the chartering of another United States bank. You have now taken the same ground that that young man originally did: but, like him, time and experience will, I have no doubt, eventually convince you that you have done wrong."

Sir, I stand here to confess that time and experience have convinced me accordingly, and to acknowledge that I was wrong, and Mr. Clay right; that the affairs of the Government and the country cannot be safely managed without the aid of some mechanism of that sort; that of such, that of a United States bank has proved itself far the most perfect that has ever been tried in this country; and that it is greatly to be lamented that, through mere party causes and their unfortunate influences, a state of public opinion has been brought about which renders it impossible now to recur to what is of itself greatly to be preferred to any other financial agent that we know of.

I need scarcely, sir, do more than advert to the events of the extra session of 1841. For both the bank bills passed at that session I gave my vote. I regretted, of course, the negative which the President felt it his duty to put upon them; and regretted it still the more, because I considered it as terminating all hope of obtaining for the country the best and most efficient of financial contrivances, and as reducing us to an expedient of secondary excellence. For, be the advantages of the older institution ever so unrivalled, what possibility can we any longer look to of again carrying that system into effect, for the extrication of the country from its present extreme embarrassments? We legislate not for what might have been, but for what is; for facts as they exist, not as we would have them. We have to consider, not what this or that party desired to accomplish and could not; but what it is now possible to effect of best and soundest. Let gentlemen who yet look to a national bank remember that some six or seven years must certainly elapse before that mode of relief can be made available to the country. Suppose our present hopes to be realized by the election of 1844: contested as the subject of a bank must continue to be, under almost any condition of parties, it must be nearly the end of the long session of the next year before a bill for this purpose can pass; another year to negotiate the stock; another to get the bank into operation; and at least another before the people can have been made to feel any of the marked benefits of the institution. Can the country, bleeding as it is at every pore, wait under its present agonies for relief so long deferred as that? No; some early, some present ease is needed; something timely to what we now suffer, and not appropriate merely to a future state of quiet and of comfort.

Having thus, sir, passed in review the chief points of the history of the most permanent and solid of the successive fiscal contrivances through which our financial system has been made to act, I come next to that confident resort of President Jackson—the State bank deposite system—for the sake of whose infinitely steadier, more manageable, and less pervertible mechanism, the flourishing finances of the country were dismantled and knocked down to their lowest stone, in order to be rebuilt upon another foundation and of different materials.

Of that experiment the memory is too recent for me to have need to say much. Suffice it to say, the system was recommended by President Jackson, and adopted by the party which sustained his administration. His prophecies of its entire success were too remarkable for me to omit some little citation of them.

In President Jackson's first annual message after the deposite-bank system had been put into operation, he spoke as follows:

"The experience of another year has confirmed the utter fallacy of the idea that the Bank of the United States was necessary as a fiscal agent for the Government. Without its aid, as such—indeed, in despite of all the embarrassment it was in its power to create—the revenue has been paid with punctuality by our citizens; the business of exchange, both foreign and domestic, has been conducted with convenience; and the circulating medium has been greatly improved. By the use of the State banks, which do not derive their charters from the General Government, and are not controlled by its authority, it is ascertained that the moneys of the United States can be collected and disbursed without loss or inconvenience, and that all the wants of the community, in relation to exchange and currency, are supplied as well as they have been before. If, under circumstances the most unfavorable to the steadiness of the money market, it has been found that the considerations on which the Bank of the United States rested its claims to the public favor were imaginary and groundless, it cannot be doubted that the experience of the future will be more decisive against them.

"It has been seen, that, without the agency of a great moneyed monopoly, the revenue can be collected, and conveniently and safely applied to all the purposes of the public expenditure. It is also ascertained, that, instead of being necessarily made to promote the evils of an unchecked paper system, the management of the revenue can be made auxiliary to the reform which the Legislatures of several of the States have already commenced in regard to the suppression of small bills; and which has only to be fostered by proper regulations on the part of Congress, to secure a practical return, to the extent required for the security of the currency, to the constitutional medium. Severed from the Government as political engines, and not susceptible of dangerous extension and combination, the State banks will not be tempted, nor will they have the power which we have seen exercised, to divert the public funds from the legitimate purposes of the Government. The collection and custody of the revenue being, on the contrary, a source of credit to them, will increase the security which the States provide for a faithful execution of their trusts, by multiplying the scrutinies to which their operations and accounts will be subjected. Thus disposed, as well from interest as the obligations of their charters, it cannot be doubted that such conditions as Congress may see fit to adopt respecting the deposites in these institutions, with a view to the gradual disuse of the small bills, will be cheerfully complied with; and that we shall soon gain, in place of the Bank of the United States, a practical reform in the whole paper system of the country. If, by this policy, we can ultimately witness the suppression of all bank bills below twenty dollars, it is apparent that gold and silver will take their place and become the principal circulating medium in the common business of the farmers and mechanics of the country. The attainment of such a result will form an era in the history of our country, which will be dwelt upon with delight by every true friend of its liberty and independence. It will lighten the great tax which our paper system has so long collected from the earnings of labor, and do more to revive and perpetuate those habits of economy and simplicity, which are so congenial to the character of republicans, than all the legislation which has yet been attempted."—Message of December, 1836.

Again, in his annual message of the next year, he holds the same confident language, as follows:

"Experience continues to realize the expectations entertained as to the capacity of the State banks to perform the duties of fiscal agents for the Government. At the time of the removal of the deposites, it was alleged by the advocates of the Bank of the United States that the State banks, whatever might be the regulations of the Treasury Department, could not make the transfers required by the Government, or negotiate the domestic exchanges of the country. It is now well ascertained that the real domestic exchanges, performed through discounts, by the United States Bank and its twenty-five branches, were at least one-third less than those of the deposite banks for an equal period of time; and if a comparison be instituted between the amounts of service rendered by these institutions, on the broader basis which has been used by the advocates of the United States Bank, in estimating what they consider the domestic exchanges transacted by it, the result will be still more favorable to the deposite banks."

He proceeds to state the large amount of exchanges which the State banks have transacted, and the laudable public spirit they were displaying in bringing specie into the country; and then winds up with the following commendation of the system and its high success:

"In the same manner have nearly all the predictions turned out in respect to the effect of the removal of the deposites—a step unquestionably necessary to prevent the evils which it was foreseen, the bank itself would endeavor to create in a final struggle to procure a renewal of its charter. It may be thus, too, in some degree, with the further steps which may be taken to prevent the excessive issue of other bank paper; but it is to be hoped that nothing will now deter the Federal and State authorities from the firm and vigorous performance of their duties to themselves and to the people in this respect."

Meaning rather to recall events, by touching on them, than in any sort to recite them, I will only remind the Senate with what fury, upon the collapse of this system, they who had constructed it, and (for their own political ends) stimulated all its vices, fell not only upon the contrivance itself, and the particularly favored banks that made a part of it, but upon all other State banks. Till now, using these institutions as their auxiliaries in the war upon a national one, they had magnified them as the sole legitimate and constitutional form of banking and of finance, the only creations of a competent authority, the legal offspring and heirs of State sovereignty, and not less safe in a commercial or fiscal sense than proper in a corporate one. Up to this point, national banks alone were hydras, monsters, and all that; while State banks were everything that was fair, well-proportioned, and safe; nay, invested, as to the Federal power, by their origin from that of the States, with an emanation of something which the former merely derivative and secondary authority must not lay impious hands upon. Now, however, in the progress of this Jacobin and Jesuit finance, came a new doctrine—that, because they had debauched a part of the State banks, all banks were illegal, and not less a fraud and inimical to the community when created by State, than when by Federal authority. In short, the very system which they and General Jackson had but a few months before exalted as so safe, so practical, so constitutional, was at once denounced as the most grievous of curses, and the most wrongful of monopolies.

In this warfare upon the deposite banks I did not join. But they were, as everybody knows, speedily crushed; and there was an end of system the second.

Of the third—that of the sub-treasury—my history shall not be long; because its life was too short for any but the briefest commemoration. It had, as everybody knows, been opposed by the party in a mass on its first introduction in the other House by General Gordon, of Virginia. This, however, did not hinder its being taken up on the explosion of the former plan of finance. Still, it could not be carried until thrice recommended by President Van Buren, with the endorsement of General Jackson. Finally it passed; but only went into operation to show how hollow it was of all that it was pretended to be; how illusive as to all its promised solidity; how unreal, except in the dangerous power it possessed, and the irresponsibility, the corruption, and the peculation to which it gave scope. In a word, it lived but long enough to draw down a general mockery and odium.

Such, sir, has been this series of improvements in currency and finance, up to the last, yet unacted on—the exchequer project of President Tyler or his Cabinet.

When, at the last session of Congress, this plan was placed before you, much discussion arose here on the question of its reference. In that discussion I took no part, choosing to reserve myself for an unbiased examination of it in committee. The measure, however, in its original form, underwent in the Senate so full and so able a discussion, that the views of Senators were disclosed at large, and the objections on all sides thoroughly understood, before the reference was finally settled. When, therefore, the subject was placed in the hands of a special committee, of which I was made chairman, they were possessed of all these objections, and in a condition to weigh, and, if possible, to obviate them all. With these objections specially in view, the bill now before the Senate had been framed and amended, and, with such deliberation and solicitude, as led the committee to trust, not without some confidence, that they had performed their task in such a manner as to steer clear of whatever defects had been detected in the original form of the measure.

The first class of objections thus taken related to the apprehended influence which the Executive might exercise over the institution, chiefly by means of his power over its officers as to appointment or removal. Upon this power we have placed an effectual guard, to the whole extent that the Constitution permits. We could not divest the President of the right to nominate the three superior officers of the exchequer—the commissioners of the board; but we have rendered them, after confirmation by the Senate, incapable of being removed, except with the concurrence of that body. He may, for physical inability, or neglect, or violation of duty, suspend a commissioner; but, unless he show to the Senate sufficient cause for the act, the officer is restored. Such is the entire extent of the executive control over the board; and its inferior officers or agents are dependent on itself, since they can be appointed or removed by the Secretary of the Treasury only upon its recommendation. It is easy to see that the entire tenure of office is thus, as to the President, rendered as independent as possible under the Constitution. The executive patronage is limited to the nomination of the three commissioners, and the executive control or interference to a temporary suspension of the same officers from their functions, for specific causes.

The second class of objections related to the power of dealing in bills of exchange; of which the purchase was considered as involving an illegitimate and dangerous mixture of the credit of the Government with the solvency or faith of individuals; as likely to be used for party or personal corruption or favoritism; and as very capable of leading to fictitious dealings in exchange, for fraudulent purposes. This power, then, the committee struck out, as dangerous, not only for these reasons, but because, for its discreet and safe exercise, three things are almost indispensable—individual interest, individual skill, and individual vigilance. These cannot be expected to act in a public institution as they do in those affairs which men conduct on their own account; and the former are, therefore, disqualified from the transaction of such business.

For all legitimate business of this sort, however, the committee have sufficiently provided in another way, preserving its benefits, and excluding only its risks. They have authorized the exchequer and its agencies to sell bills of exchange on itself, and to collect them, paying their amount to the depositor only when collected by the agency at the place on which drawn.

By its sale of bills, it will accomplish for individuals the legitimate operation of remitting funds, and withhold itself only from the illegitimate and dangerous one of anticipating them. He who wishes to do this, may still resort, for a temporary discount, to a local bank, whose business is this of anticipating funds at a distance. Meantime, he may collect those funds through the exchequer or its agencies.

The facilities of business, which this system of selling and collecting bills of exchange will give, will promote the sounder interests of the country, not less than would the power to purchase exchange; while, at the same time, the Government will be kept safe from all loss or hazard.

The third class of objections related to the issue of treasury notes on the credit of the Government; that is, its adding to its indirect power over the monetary circulation of the country, through the management of its revenues, the direct power of supplying a currency.

As to any issue, by the exchequer, of any currency, as such merely—any credit currency—I have been unable to discover any motives for such a thing except two: 1st, in order to anticipate the revenues of the Government; 2d, to aid the currency of the country by an addition to its circulating medium. But of the first of these, the committee hold that it is wrong in principle. Its tendency would be to bring about excessive issues, and to induce a resort to these mere expedients, rather than to a discharge of its less popular duty of levying adequate supplies. It will be dispensing with the most salutary and certain of all checks upon the Government—its inability to raise money without the consent of the people through their Representatives. In any unusual emergency, where the means in the treasury unexpectedly fell short, resort may be had to the authority of Congress for the issue of treasury notes, bearing interest as a loan, but not sent out as a currency. So much for the first point. As to the second, the committee regard the purpose as (for the reasons already given) unwarrantable, and its attainment as of most questionable possibility. If the existing currency were far below the business wants of the community, then much of it, as now, would stand upon a more solid basis than any mere credit circulation, although emitted by the Government itself; so that the latter would necessarily be an addition to the depreciated currency, an equal part of which it would be almost certain to displace and drive out of the circulation, by reducing its value still lower; and thus no permanent addition to the circulation could be made in this way. A fresh disorder only, and a further depreciation, would be produced.

With the mere fluctuations of the medium of exchange, Government cannot safely interfere. These must be left to regulate themselves, through the agency of individual sagacity, keeping watch over its own interests. To be safe, it must be left to its own voluntary power of expansion, as little capable of being directed, and as quick and subtle to manage itself, as the power of the eye to dilate or contract, according to the quantity of light which you pour upon it.

The committee, therefore, have discarded from the bill everything like a proposition for a credit circulation. They contemplate no addition to the currency. The business of discounts they leave to the local institutions, as proper only to them; and, as according to the ease with which these can be obtained will be the varying quantity of money which will be poured into the circulation or driven back from it, expansion and contraction will be left to the instinctive care of private interest. The committee, in a word, have not aimed to devise a system which shall furnish a complete currency; but only at one which shall infuse into that which we already possess a new element of soundness, and resorts of convenience which it cannot now command.

They propose, then, that the bills issued shall only be for specie deposited, dollar for dollar; the amount of such paper in circulation being never permitted, in any case, to exceed the specie on hand for its redemption. The bills thus issued are called specie notes, in contradistinction to treasury notes emitted on the credit of the Government only, either as a currency or for the purpose of borrowing.

These specie notes, issued to the public creditor in disbursement out of the actual receipts of the revenue, or to individuals upon deposites in specie, will form a currency of the most perfect character, combining the convenience of paper with the solidity of coin; so that they will be everywhere preferred to the latter. They will neither increase nor diminish the currency, but merely give it a new activity and a wider uniformity; so that the unaugmented quantity will perform a much greater office. They can produce no expansion or contraction of the currency, no inflation, no rise or fall of prices, no expulsion of coin from the circulation, such as attends other emissions of paper.

It may, however, be urged, that a circulation thus formed can afford no relief, or, at best, a very slight one. I answer, that the capacity of such a currency is not to be measured by its amount, but by the peculiar functions (now attainable in no other way) which it will perform.

Uniformity of value in the currency is now the greatest benefit that can be bestowed upon commerce. In showing, as I have already done, that the Government cannot safely issue a credit currency, I have sufficiently shown that we cannot aim at supplying, integrally, the whole amount of currency, uniformly valuable, which the country requires; and that, except upon this plan of adding nothing to the circulation, we should only lessen, instead of increasing, this quality in the currency. The partial but important good to which we must then restrict ourselves, is the supplying, not circulation in the mass—for that, the variously depreciated paper of each quarter already affords—but a new and universally current circulation, which may pass alike from sphere to sphere, and from vortex to vortex of these local circulations, each limited to its own locality, and unite them all. It is not as to this local purpose of a circulation that we are suffering, but for something that can perform the distant offices of interchange. Such must the proposed currency become, entering but little into any local circulation, but making itself the vehicle of distant transactions, from sphere to sphere of the local circulations; to which, of course, in amount, it need bear but a very small proportion. But, as to the amount of the Government disbursements, or something like it—say twenty or twenty five millions of dollars—may be added the equivalents to individual deposites of specie, and the sale and collection of bills of exchange; it will be seen that an amount of specie-notes will probably be kept afloat quite equal to very important purposes. Emigration, travel, and the deposite of gold and silver by foreigners seeking to purchase lands, would also add considerably to the amount.

Let it, in this view, be recollected that the average circulation of the United States Bank was about ten millions of dollars; and, until 1829, only about six millions; and that its specie was usually equal to its circulation. This exchequer, creating a still greater confidence, and commanding meanwhile large, could surely perform the same general functions—admitted to have been so beneficent—as that bank could accomplish with only the amount of circulation which I have mentioned.

I doubt not that, besides all these advantages to trade, it must act, in a variety of ways, and especially by bringing about speedy and singular settlements, to keep the banking institutions of the country generally sound. Nor can it well fail to restore to the circulation a large amount of specie which individual distrust of banks has unquestionably withdrawn and hoarded. Though it may not (as I have said) effect all that the times have need of, but no longer permit, it must clearly accomplish much. As to any defects which it may have, they can, I think, be none of them of a sort so capital but that we shall be able to correct them as they make themselves felt.

From what has been said, the principles of the bill are sufficiently obvious. As to the effect on the currency and the exchanges, I cannot so well set it forth as by quoting the views on that subject which were embodied in my report. They are as follows:

> The committee, on this whole subject, have consulted some of the ablest, most practical, and experienced men; and their own views are fully confirmed by the information derived from such high sources. They cannot in any way so well illustrate this branch of it, and its beneficial effects on the sound local banks, together with other advantages, as by briefly embodying the following views which have thus been communicated to them:
> "A bill drawn by one agency on another, in any remote part of the United States, will be as good as specie within the commercial sphere of the emporium where the agency is located at which payment is to be made, and may generally be negotiated above par by any holder within that sphere, and at a rate in some measure proportioned to his distance from its commercial centre. If, for instance, a merchant in Cincinnati wishes to remit money to a manufacturer in Connecticut, a bill drawn by the agency in Cincinnati, where the deposite is made, on the agency in New York, would be worth one-half per cent. more than specie to the payee.
> "Exchanges through the agencies will meet all the extremes of the markets. It not unfrequently happens that New Orleans is indebted to Ohio for agricultural products; Ohio to New York for manufactured goods, domestic or imported; and New York to New Orleans for cotton. Every well-informed merchant in those several sections will be advised of the state of the markets. A New Orleans merchant wishes to remit to Ohio; he deposites his specie in the agency at New Orleans, and gets the same office to accept his own bill of exchange for $1,000, payable to the order of his Ohio correspondent, and transmits it accordingly. This will be above par in the Ohio market, because it is a good remittance for New York, where bills on New Orleans command a premium. It is bought by an Ohio merchant, who remits it to New York in payment for goods; and from New York it is sent to New Orleans, to pay for cotton. Upon its arrival, it is presented to the agency where it was accepted, and the specie is ready for its redemption. The holder, however, not willing to be burdened with the specie, will generally prefer the specie-notes of the agency. Thus this $1,000 in specie, after paying a small premium at the agency, will have paid more than its amount in two remote markets, sent a safe and convenient currency of $1,000 into the channels of commerce, and is still at rest sustaining this amount of circulation.
> "The use of bills of exchange will not be superseded by the specie-notes of the exchequer. The former have always been referred, and were extensively used under the two national banks when their paper, in sound credit, had every advantage which this will possess, of being made such a substitute. This proof from experience is conclusive. One ground of preference, which has always been appreciated here and in Europe, is, that bills of exchange are more safe than bank notes, as they offer no temptation to robbery or embezzlement; and, as several may be sent of the same tenor and date by different conveyances, (in which case, no loss will be sustained if any one arrives in safety,) the risk may easily be reduced almost to an impossibility. The perfect character of these bills of exchange, from their undoubted credit, will generally give them a preference over others. They will never be protested for want of funds, at the office where they are payable. No embarrassment can result from the necessity of transmitting specie from office to office. The occasions are very rare (and, if this system were in operation, would be still more rare) in which specie needs to be removed; as for almost every purpose good paper is preferred. The paper of one office would generally be as good as specie in most others. If a deposite were made at New York to meet a draft on the office in New Orleans, this latter office would prefer the New York paper to coin, in the common state of exchanges. When the system has been some time in operation, specie will have found its proper places of repose, and movements of it would seldom be required. Should an apprehension be entertained that the retirement of specie into the agencies would embarrass the banks, it will be dissipated by a little reflection upon the operations already described. Those officers are bound to deliver, at the time of deposite, an amount in paper equal to the amount received in specie. That paper will take the place of the specie which it represents, and the same portion of it will be deposited by merchants and others who keep their accounts in banking institutions as of the specie for which it is a substitute. As it will be a light and convenient circulation, it will mingle more with the paper of banks of sound credit in common commercial operations, and consequently be more frequently used in making payments upon discounted notes and other indebtedness to moneyed institutions, than specie now is. When possessed by a bank, it has all the value of specie. If means are wanted for deposite in an agency, this paper will be received of a bank, for that purpose, as readily as specie. Should gold and silver be wanted for exportation, or any other extraordinary demand, the bank which possesses this paper has the certain means of converting it, at pleasure, into the article required. Every bill of exchange payable at these offices will, at its maturity, restore to circulation, either in specie or this sound paper, the amount deposited for its procurement. Indeed, it is difficult to foster a doubt that, in regard to the means of redeeming their own emissions, the banks will possess more ample resources than at present. It is true, that the channels of commerce will be partially filled with a medium of sound and imperishable credit, which will stand the shock of every possible vicissitude, except the subversion of the Government. But this will promote the strength of the banking institutions no less than the stability of the currency.

"From the establishment of a national corporation with a large specie capital, the banks were apprehensive of sustaining injury by the great and sudden withdrawment of the precious metals from their possession. But the agencies can produce no such embarrassment; for their progress will be too gradual to cause any convulsion; and the immediate restoration to the market of a medium of equal amount and value with that which is withdrawn, will enable those institutions at any time to command the specie which they require. As a just price is to be paid for exchanges, it is believed that all the expenses of conducting the business of the exchequer and its agencies will be defrayed from that source, and probably a much larger sum may be realized. The losses of the currency by fire, shipwreck, and other casualties, as shown in the experience of banks, would not be an inconsiderable item of gain. A small premium (say a half or quarter of one per cent.) might reasonably be exacted of depositors, if hereafter deemed necessary, upon notes issued in exchange for specie. While this system will furnish the desired means for the collecting, safekeeping, and disbursement of the public revenue, and all the requisite facilities for exchanges between different sections of the country, as well as create a sound and convenient currency, it is exempt from the objectionable features of other modes of effecting, in part or in whole, the same objects heretofore presented for consideration. It authorizes no banks or other corporations, no discounts, no lending on credit in any form whatever, no expansion of the currency by public drafts or otherwise, no paper money resting on the credit of the Government, and depending on accruing revenues for redemption. It confers no extent of executive patronage or influence. No officer can be either appointed or removed by the President, without the concurrence of the Senate, and only for certain specified causes. It confers no discretionary powers by which partialities may be indulged in behalf of a personal or political favorite. Whoever presents his specie notes, or bills of exchange, at maturity, is entitled to his specie; and whoever presents his specie, is entitled to the paper which he selects. The rights of every applicant are defined by law, and his transactions at the agency are of the simplest character. The laws of trade, and not any superintending board or public agent, decide the amount of deposites, bills of exchange, and paper currency. The wants and means of individuals composing the community will best regulate the proportions of paper and specie, in the absence of all artificial restraint and supervision of the Government."

Shall we, then, Mr. President, adopt this measure with the modifications I have proposed; or shall we, in spite of the cries which appeal to us on all sides—the terrible and wide-spread distress that reigns over the whole country—the alarming paralysis of all industry and trade—the frightful sacrifices of property that are happening everywhere, and all the appalling difficulties that have frozen up the courage and the hopes of the country to its very heart, calmly sit down, dismiss all thought of attempting a remedy, shut our eyes, stop our ears, and determine to do nothing? Do nothing, did I say? Do nothing, whilst the country is bleeding at every pore for want of action here? Do nothing, whilst our commerce is languishing, our manufacturing and mechanic interests paralyzed, our agricultural products rotting on our hands for want of a market! Do nothing, whilst an agonizing and distracted people are looking to us for relief! Do nothing, whilst the cries of helpless women and children, with starvation before them, are borne to us on every breeze! Do nothing, because the time has gone by for the adoption of one favorite measure, and because the time has not arrived for the adoption of another! Do nothing—yes, Mr. President, do nothing, whilst the country is sacrificed between the conflicting interests of contending parties! Sir, I need add no more. During the last ten years, since I have been honored with a seat in this body, I have endeavored, faithfully, fearlessly, and conscientiously, to discharge my duty, without regard to consequences, personal or political. I shall continue so to discharge it; and, without intending the remotest reflection on the motives and conduct of others, I shall always feel a proud consciousness, in the introduction of this bill, and in advocating its passage, of having done my duty to myself, to my constituents, and to the country.

SPEECH OF MR. RIVES,

OF VIRGINIA.

In Senate of the United States, March 2d, 1843—On the bill for carrying into effect the treaty with Great Britain.

The bill for carrying into effect the treaty with Great Britain being under consideration, Mr. ALLEN of Ohio moved to amend the sixth section of the bill, which "empowers the President, in execution of the eighth article of the treaty, to apply so much of the naval appropriations as may be necessary therefor, to the preparation, equipment, and maintenance of the naval force therein stipulated to be employed on the coast of Africa by the United States," by adding a proviso, that the sum so applied shall not exceed $240,000. The question being upon Mr. ALLEN's amendment—

Mr. RIVES rose and said, that if the treaty be executed at all, it ought not to be executed by halves. He was in favor of a full, exact, and faithful compliance with the stipulations of the treaty on our part, till there had been some overt act of contravention to it on the part of Great Britain, which he had seen no sufficient reason to apprehend. It is in this way only that the national faith and honor can be preserved intact, and that the other party will be left without excuse, if there should be any disposition on its part not to act fully up to the spirit and intention of the arrangement. The sum limited by the amendment of the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. ALLEN,] was obviously, and even glaringly, inadequate to the support of a squadron of eighty guns, with its proper complement of men and officers, on the coast of Africa; and considering it, therefore, equivalent to a negative on the full execution of the treaty, he should unhesitatingly vote against it.

Nor (said Mr. RIVES) can I concur in the suggestion of my honorable colleague, [Mr. ARCHER,] that the whole of the sixth section of the bill might, without impropriety, be stricken out. On the contrary, I see in it, with pleasure, a seasonable recognition of the doctrine successfully maintained, after an arduous conflict, by the Republican party on two memorable occasions—Jay's treaty in 1795, and the commercial convention with Great Britain in 1815—a doctrine which I believe to embody the true reading of the Constitution, and which establishes the principle, that, in regard to all matters submitted by the terms of the Constitution to the action of Congress, (as in this instance, the power to provide and maintain a naval force,) the stipulations of a treaty must depend for their execution on the free and responsible co-operation of the legislative department. This, too, is in conformity to the British practice. On a recent and analogous occasion in that country, the slave-trade conventions of 1831 and 1833 with France, after having been duly ratified by the treaty-making power, were formally enacted into law, word for word, by the authority of Parliament, and clothed with all the specialities of a British statute. Surely, in our popular representative system, there ought not to be less a constitutional balance and control, in the hands of the legislative department, to the treaty-making power.

The principle recognised by the sixth section of this bill acquires an additional hold upon our attention, in the present instance, from the consideration that if, unfortunately, there shall hereafter arise any serious practical disagreement between the two Governments respecting the true intent and meaning of the arrangement which has been entered into, it may become the solemn duty of Congress to interpose its high remedial powers, as it did in the memorable example of 1798, in our relations with France, for the purpose of putting an end to stipulations which have not been reciprocally observed by the other contracting party, in their true spirit, and fair and obvious import.

I repeat, Mr. President, that I do not, and will not, anticipate the occurrence of any such disagreement, until much more substantial grounds for the apprehension than any which have yet appeared shall disclose themselves. When Sir Robert Peel, in the speech which was commented upon here a few days ago, says that the British Government, by the treaty of Washington, had not abandoned or renounced the doctrine of the right of visitation, as laid down in Lord Aberdeen's letters, I can readily comprehend the declaration. It was not the purpose of that arrangement to adjust a creed, or establish a code of abstract principles. No abandonment or renunciation was asked from Great Britain of any doctrine or principle she maintained in regard to the alleged right of visitation. It was sufficient that we wholly denied the existence of any such right; and that we had, in the most solemn form, through the highest organ of our international relations, proclaimed that denial to England and the world. The rights we claimed were to be held, not by the concession or acknowledgment of any other power, but by our own confidence in their justice, and by our determination to maintain them.

But there were practical evils admitted by both Governments, which required a practical remedy. The flag of the United States had been extensively abused on the coast of Africa, by the slave-dealers of nations which had granted to Great Britain the right of search for the suppression of the slave-trade, to cover the iniquitous traffic in which they were engaged. The cruisers of Great Britain, in the execution of this right of search, conceded to them by certain powers of Europe and America, and pursuing what they alleged to believe were, in reality, Spanish, Portuguese, or Brazilian vessels, which sought to disguise themselves by fraudulently hoisting the flag of the United States, had, in many instances, visited and detained bona fide merchant vessels of the United States, and subjected them to interruptions, more or less injurious, in the prosecution of their voyages. These interruptions and detentions of the vessels of the United States became (as, of right, they ought to have become) the subject of spirited remonstrance and demand for redress upon the British Government; and were engendering a serious degree of irritation and dissatisfaction in the relations of the two countries. The Government of Great Britain constantly alleged, in extenuation or excuse of these cases—which were, from time to time, brought to its notice—the fact (admitted by our minister) that the flag of the United States had been "grossly abused" by the vessels of other nations, to cover their criminal and unlawful pursuits. They further declared (what, indeed, it was difficult to gainsay) that, unless effectual measures of some sort were taken to prevent this abuse, the flag of the United States would become the shelter under which the malefactors of all nations would prosecute, with impunity, a traffic which the laws of the United States were the first to denounce as infamous, and to pursue with the severest penalties.

The Government of the United States felt that, whatever measures were necessary to protect the national flag from abuse, either by our own citizens or by the subjects of foreign powers, the adoption and the execution of those measures belonged to the United States themselves. It was inconsistent with the principles which they had invariably held in regard to the mutual independence and equality of all nations on the ocean, as well as with their own jealous sense of national dignity, to confide the supervision of their flag, in any case, to the cruisers of another power. To remove from themselves, therefore, all possible reproach of even a negative connivance at the abuse of their flag by the vessels of other nations, and at the same time to take away from British cruisers all pretext for interference with the American flag on the ground of such suspected abuse,—while they gave to the world the most unequivocal pledge of their sincerity, and determination to aid in all proper measures for the final extinction of the African slave-trade, the United States proposed, in concurrence with the British Government, the employment by the two countries of "independent" squadrons, of "sufficient and adequate" force, to cruise on the coast of Africa, and "to enforce, separately and respectively, the laws, rights, and obligations of each of the two countries for the suppression of the slave trade." The distinctive and avowed principle of the arrangement, on its face, was the separate and independent action of the naval force of the two countries; and was obviously intended to supersede, in practice, so far as its operation extended, any visitation of the flag of the one power by the cruisers of the other.

That the legitimate and bona fide effect of the arrangement, within the sphere and for the time of its operation, is to put an end, in fact, to those visitations and detentions of the American flag on the coast of Africa, which had been the subject of complaint and discussion between the two Governments, whatever arguments or pretensions may still be urged by the British Government on the abstract question of the alleged right in general, is placed beyond all controversy by a recurrence to the correspondence between the representatives of the two Governments in London, which preceded the negotiation, and furnishes the true key to the interpretation of this arrangement. It was, as I have already stated, the extensive and admitted abuse of the flag of the United States by the vessels of other nations, which sought, by fraudulently assuming it, to protect the guilty traffic in which they were engaged from detection and arrest, that the British Government constantly put forward to excuse or justify the visitation of American vessels by their cruisers. Lord Aberdeen, in his letter of 13th October, 1841, to Mr. Stevenson, says:

"The confession of Mr. Stevenson, that the trade is extensively carried on under the fraudulent use of the American flag, does, in truth, justify the whole claim put forward by the British Government. It constitutes that reasonable ground of suspicion which the law of nations requires in such a case. The admitted fact of this abuse creates the right of inquiry."

Now, when effectual measures have been taken by the United States to prevent this abuse of their flag, by the employment of an adequate squadron of their naval force on the coast of Africa for the purpose—measures which have received the solemn and deliberate concurrence of the British Government, with an express recognition of their "sufficiency" by the terms of the treaty, and after "consultation with the British negotiator" (as the President informs us in his late message to the House of Representatives) "as to the quantum of force necessary to be employed in order to obtain the object in view"—such measures, the "adequacy and sufficiency" of which are admitted by the British Government itself, are taken by the United States to prevent the abuse of their flag, the logical and necessary consequence, even upon their own principles, is, that the visitation or detention of American vessels, which they have attempted to justify or excuse only by the fact of that abuse, must cease with it. It is, says Lord Aberdeen, "the admitted fact of this abuse which creates the right of inquiry." But when effectual provision is made to prevent and guard against this abuse, by an arrangement to which Great Britain is herself a party, the right of inquiry, or visitation, which was built upon the hypothesis of that abuse, must, to that extent at least, cease to exist. It requires no express agreement, under these circumstances, to create the obligation of abstaining from the visitations and detentions of the American flag, which had been complained of. In such a case, res ipse loquitur. The transaction explains, and carries its meaning and obligation on its face.

Any renewal, under such circumstances, of the vexations to which the American flag had been subjected on the coast of Africa, would be in direct contravention of what was universally understood here, upon the spot of the negotiation, to be the practical effect of the arrangement. It could not fail to give rise to the gravest possible question in the relations of the two countries. I cannot, and will not, believe that there is any such design on the part of the British Government. When it is recollected what honorable and emphatic language was employed, but two or three years ago, on this same subject, by that remarkable man—the master-spirit of his country—whose firm and steady hand now guides the course of her public councils, the highest personal pledge is superadded to the most solemn national guaranty. I allude, of course, to the Duke of Wellington. In 1839, when a bill for the more effectual suppression of the slave-trade was brought forward in the House of Lords, by the administration of Lord Melbourne, to indemnify officers of the British navy for visiting and detaining any foreign vessels on the high seas, on suspicion, and examining their papers, the Duke of Wellington protested against it with all the honest energies of his high intellect and character. If his speeches on the occasion have not been incorrectly reported, he denounced it as a novelty in the legislation of the country, and in the practice of nations. He admonished their lordships that there was "one great nation, at least—the United States of America"—who would not submit to it; that, if there was one point more to be avoided than another, it was that relating to the visitation of vessels belonging to the American Union; and, finally, he warned the Government not to proceed with their bill, but "rather to issue an order in council, or a declaration of war!"

While I feel, therefore, (said Mr. R.,) every assurance which can be inspired by the faith of a solemn international transaction, and by declarations of the most imposing weight in the public councils of Great Britain, that there will be no attempt to renew in practice, under existing circumstances, the visitation of the American flag on the coast of Africa; yet it cannot be denied that the abstract doctrines recently put forth by the British Government in regard to an alleged right of visitation, are well calculated to arouse the timely attention of the United States and the other maritime powers of the world.

I know, Mr. President, how precious every moment of the time of the Senate is, on this the last day but one of the session. I do not mean, therefore, to enter into any systematic discussion of this grave and most important question. But, being compelled to differ, in an essential respect, from a document of very high authority, (I allude to the message of the President to the House of Representatives on the 27th ult.,) and deeming it of very great moment, if an error should have been inadvertently committed in that exposition of the doctrines of maritime law, as supposed to be contended for by the United States, that it should not go forth to the world with the presumed concurrence of the other branches of the Government—which would naturally be inferred, if no dissent were expressed in either House of the National Legislature;—the Senate, I am sure, will bear with me, even at this late hour, while I state, as briefly as the nature of the subject will admit, the principles which I conceive to have been heretofore invariably maintained, with the justest reason, by the Government of the United States.

It is of the utmost importance that there should be no misconception or uncertainty as to the position the United States occupy on these vital questions, affecting the general freedom of the seas. Providence seems to have cast upon us, in an especial manner, the responsibility and the honor of being the standard-bearer in this great cause. While the attempts made, from time to time, by other nations to sustain it, have given way to the seductions of temporary expediency, or been crushed by the force of powerful combinations, the United States alone, through every vicissitude of fortune, and often with fearful odds against them, have stood forth the steady and unwavering champions of the immunity and independence of flags upon the ocean. The efforts and writings of our great statesmen in this cause—of Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe—no less than the brilliant deeds of our warriors, in the same glorious struggle, are among the proudest illustrations of our past history. We must be cautious, therefore, to surrender nothing which has been thus dearly and nobly won.

The message of the President to the House of Representatives, while denying the right of Great Britain to exercise a general police over the flags of independent nations, yet asserts that if the vessel of another nation—of the United States, for example—be suspected of piracy upon what shall seem probable cause, the seizure and detention of such a vessel by a British cruiser, though the suspicion turn out erroneous, would give rise to neither public responsibility, nor any claim of indemnity to the owner. "The right, under such circumstances," says the message, "not only to visit and detain, but to search a ship, is a perfect right, and involves neither responsibility nor indemnity." Now, Mr. President, I must say, with all respect, that this doctrine of the message seems to me not to have been very well considered, and cannot be easily reconciled with those impregnable principles of public law, upon which we have heretofore stood against the world in arms. I had supposed that if any principle of the maritime code had been triumphantly vindicated and upheld by the labor of American statesmen, it was this:—that, in time of peace, there is no right, in any case, on the part of a foreign cruiser, to interrupt or detain the vessels of another nation upon the high seas; that a vessel of a nation on the high seas, in time of peace, partakes of the inviolability of her territory; and that any entry on board such vessel, without consent, is, in the eye of the law, a trespass. If a vessel, under the circumstances supposed in the message, be suspected of being a pirate, a foreign cruiser may, upon her responsibility, stop and examine her; but she does so at her peril. If the suspected vessel be in reality a pirate, no harm will have been done; but if, on the other hand, she prove to be a bona fide vessel of the nation whose flag she bears, a trespass will have been committed, involving both responsibility and indemnity, according to the circumstances of the case.

It would not be difficult to show that these principles have, in other times—and those, too, not distinguished by any peculiar favor shown to the maritime rights of other nations—been recognised in the fullest manner by the highest British authorities. In a well known case brought before him as judge, the celebrated Sir William Scott (afterwards Lord Stowell) emphatically declared that "he could find no authority that gives the right of interruption to the navigation of States upon the high seas, except that which the right of war gives to belligerents against neutrals." But the whole doctrine upon this subject has been stated in so lucid and comprehensive a manner, and with such self-evident reason, in a despatch of Mr. Monroe, while Secretary of State under the administration of Mr. Madison, that I cannot forbear to quote here what was said by the American Government, with so much weight of authority, on that occasion. In the instructions to our plenipotentiaries for treating of peace with Great Britain, dated the 15th April, 1813, the American doctrine—the matured and carefully considered result of our long discussions with that power on the subject of maritime rights—was thus clearly and deliberately summed up:

"That the vessels of a nation are considered a part of its territory, with the exception of the belligerent right only, is a principle too well established to be brought into discussion. Each State has exclusive jurisdiction over its own vessels. Its laws govern in them; and offences against those laws are punishable by its tribunals only. The flag of a nation protects everything sailing under it in time of peace; and in time of war likewise, with the exception of the belligerent rights growing out of the war. An entry on board the vessels of one power by the cruisers of another, in any other case, or the exercise of any other authority over them, is a violation of right, and an act of hostility."

It is incumbent upon us to maintain this principle of the law of nations inflexibly, and in its undiminished integrity. The inviolability of the deck of an American vessel on the high seas, under all circumstances, in time of peace; and in time of war, with those limited exceptions only which are established by the acknowledged laws of war as affecting neutrals—is a doctrine indissolubly connected with our national honor and security. To admit a right of entry on board an American vessel on the high seas, in any case, in time of peace, is to surrender the principle, and to open a door for the most dangerous abuses.

On this subject, we may learn useful lessons from the history of the past. In our long and bitter controversy with Great Britain respecting impressment, unable to find any principle of the law of nations which gave her the right to enter on board American vessels in quest of British seamen, she defended the practice under cover of a right of entry acknowledged to exist in time of war, for a wholly different object. She said that, by the acknowledged rules of international law, we have a right to board and search neutral vessels in time of war, for contraband and enemies' property; and being, in the exercise of this unquestioned right, lawfully on board an American vessel, if we find British seamen there, we may lawfully impress and carry them away; though we had no right, in the first instance, to go on board for such an object. This was the British argument, in justification of the impressment of seamen on board American vessels, gravely put forth to the world in the memorable declaration of the Prince Regent of the 9th of January, 1813.

Now, Mr. President, if, contrary to the whole current of doctrine and authority by which we have been heretofore guided on this subject of maritime rights, we yield a right of entry into an American vessel in time of peace, in any case, upon the plea of suspected piracy, or any other,—do we not afford a cover, under which Great Britain, if her pride or policy should dictate, may be emboldened to renew her claim of impressment, even in a time of general peace? She might well say (after the formula of the Prince Regent's declaration) that, being rightfully on board, upon suspicion of piracy, by your own admission, and finding there those we claim to be our seamen, we will impress them, in the name and by virtue of that natural allegiance which our laws declare to be permanent and unchangeable, and which is due in peace as well as war.*

Of all the pretexts for the violation of our flag, the loosest, and most susceptible of abuse in practice, would be the plea of suspected piracy. What are the external indicia of a pirate? A low, long, black-looking vessel, we are told; and, under this description, every Baltimore schooner would be subject to be boarded and overhauled. What, in the modern use of language, constitutes piracy itself? In the plastic hands of diplomacy or power, nothing is susceptible of a greater variety of Proteean shapes. We cannot have forgotten that, in a solemn official communication which the late British Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Lord Palmerston) caused to be addressed to this Government, in justification of the destruction of the Caroline within the limits of our territory, the citizens of the United States who took part with the inhabitants of Canada in the late insurrection in that province were gravely characterized as "American pirates;" and an elaborate argument from Mr. Webster was necessary to prove that this application of the term was not proper. In the discussions which took place between the same minister and our representative in London, on this very subject of the right of visit, he habitually denominated vessels supposed to be engaged in the slave-trade, as "slave-trading pirates;" and he repeatedly and emphatically appealed to the denunciation of the trade as piracy by the laws of the United States. It is easy to foresee, therefore, how, under an admitted right of visit, and search also, according to the message, upon suspicion of piracy, with a little of the dexterity and boldness of diplomacy in the use of language, the whole of our growing and important commerce on the coast of Africa might be driven from those seas by insupportable vexations.

The only security to the rights of American navigation on the ocean, and for the honor of our flag, is to adhere inflexibly to the doctrine which was maintained by our fathers, and which has been delivered down to us from the great oracles of public law in Europe and America—that, in time of peace, there is no right, in any case whatever, in the part of a foreign cruiser, to enter and detain, on the high seas, (whether under the name of visit or search,) a vessel which bears our national flag; by which, of course, is meant the legitimate and bona fide flag of the United States. In the British discussions of this doctrine, it has been very unfairly argued, as if we claimed some mysterious virtue for the mere outward ensign—"the piece of bunting," as Lord Palmerston permitted himself to call it, "with the United States emblems and colors upon it;" and that any vessel engaged in the slave-trade could protect herself from search by merely hoisting one of these pieces of bunting; and that thus British vessels, engaged in a violation of the laws of their own country—Portuguese, Spanish, and Brazilian slave-traders, expressly subjected to search by the treaty stipulations of their respective Governments—and notorious piratical outlaws—would all be enabled, by this fraudulent disguise, to pass on with security, before the eyes of a British squadron. Now, Mr. President, it is hardly necessary for me to say that all this is purely gratuitious. The immunity we claim is for bona fide American vessels, entitled to carry the flag of their country. We admit, in the most unqualified manner, the right of British cruisers to visit, detain, and search their own vessels, Portuguese, Spanish, and Brazilian vessels, and piratical outlaws, even though any of them may have fraudulently assumed the colors of the United States. But, to render the act lawful, the vessels thus detained and searched must be truly what they are suspected to be—to wit, British, Spanish, Portuguese, Brazilian, piratical—and not bona fide American vessels. It is an acknowledged maxim of universal law, that every party, while exercising his own rights, must take care not to violate the rights of others—Sic utere tuo, ut non alienum lædas.

Our late able and distinguished minister in France (General Cass)—who, at a critical moment for the honor and safety of his country, and with a promptitude and success which give him lasting claims upon the gratitude of the nation, came forward to vindicate the principles of our American doctrine in the eyes of Europe, and especially of our ancient and chivalrous ally—has furnished, in his admirable exposition on that occasion, an illustration of the subject, from the transactions of civil life, which cannot fail to carry conviction to every mind. He compares the situation of a British cruiser, claiming and acknowledged to possess the right to visit and detain British, Portuguese, Spanish, and Brazilian vessels on the high seas, to that of a ministerial officer of justice, under the municipal law, who has a writ or warrant of apprehend against a particular individual. His lawful authority is to arrest A; but he suspects B to be A in disguise. This suspicion gives him no right to arrest B; but he may do so, at his risk. If the person apprehended turns out to be A, the act is justified by the event; but if, on the other hand, he be truly B, then a trespass has been committed, and an action of false imprisonment lies against the officer. In this action, the damages, it is true, may be materially reduced and mitigated by the consideration of strong circumstances of suspicion in regard to the identity of B, and the little actual injury he may have sustained; but, in every case, the inviolability of the personal liberty of the citizen is maintained, and vindicated as an inexorable principle of the law. In like manner, we can never admit as a matter of right, (however circumstances, in rare and extraordinary cases, might be allowed to mitigate or extenuate the trespass,) the claim of the British Government to visit and detain American vessels on the high seas, in time of peace, because they may be suspected of being British, or other vessels lawfully subject to search, and seeking to screen themselves by hoisting American colors. If British cruisers, under such circumstances, visit and detain vessels which turn out to be bona fide American vessels, they do it, necessarily, at their risk, and without right.

It is curious and instructive to trace the successive phases under which this claim has been, at different times, presented by the British Government. It was first brought forward by Lord Palmerston, in his letter to Mr. Stevenson of the 27th August, 1841. It was then claimed as "a right to see, by an examination of papers, that the vessel bearing the flag of the United States was provided with papers entitling her to wear that flag, and proving her to be United States property, and navigated according to law;" and it was to be exercised generally under "circumstances which justify a suspicion that such vessels are engaged in the slave-trade." The annunciation of the claim was met by our minister (Mr. Stevenson) with an energy and decision, and a ready ability, which do him much honor. A change of administration having occurred, the subject passed into the hands of Lord Aberdeen. While re-asserting the British claim, he did so in far more limited and cautious terms. In his letter to Mr. Stevenson of 13th October, 1841, he described it as a right to "ascertain, by visit and inquiry, the nationality," simply, "of the vessel;" and limited it to cases of "the most grave suspicion and well-founded doubts of the genuineness of its character." The claim, as yet, was not qualified by any admission of the obligation of indemnity in case of mistake. At length came the letter of Lord Aberdeen to Mr. Everett, of the 20th December, 1841, in which his Lordship states that "if, notwithstanding the utmost caution, an error should be committed, and any American vessel should suffer loss and injury, it would be followed by prompt and ample reparation." Here, it is readily admitted, is an important modification of the ground originally assumed. But, in the same letter, the right is still asserted, in absolute terms, to visit and detain American vessels on the high seas, when their nationality is suspected, in order to ascertain, by their papers or "other proofs," the genuineness of their character; and we are now, it seems, formally apprized, through a despatch of Lord Aberdeen to Mr. Fox, that this alleged right continues to be maintained by the British Government, and will not be abandoned. To this there is but one answer,—that the right claimed is still denied by the United States, and will never be admitted or acquiesced in; and I trust, sir, when the official answer shall go from this Government, due care will be taken to guard against any inferences, to the prejudice of those doctrines of maritime law which we have hitherto invariably maintained, from any hurried or inadvertent expressions in the recent message to the House of Representatives.

The people of this country, Mr. President, will never admit the claim of Great Britain, or any other power, as a matter of right, to stop and examine their vessels on the high seas, in time of peace, in any case, or under any pretext whatever. They cannot be reconciled to a demand, thus imperious in its character and dangerous in its consequences, by the promise of reparation and indemnity in case of mistake and consequential injury. They have not forgotten that a similar inducement was held out to a recognition of the odious claim of impressment, and how that proposition was answered by their Government. Mr. Monroe, as Secretary of State, was instructed to communicate the views of the American Government upon it, in the following terms, to our plenipotentiaries for treating of peace:

"It has been suggested, as an expedient for the adjustment of this controversy, that British cruisers should have a right to search our vessels for British seamen; but that the commanders thereof should be subjected to penalties in case they made mistakes, and took from them American citizens. By this, the British Government would acquire the right of search for seamen, with that of impressing from our vessels the subjects of all other powers. It will not escape your attention, that, by admitting the right in any case, we give up the principle, and leave the door open to every kind of abuse. The same objection is applicable to any and every other arrangement which withholds the respect due to our flag, by not allowing it to protect the crew sailing under it."

The same considerations are equally conclusive against the admission of a right on the part of British cruisers, in any case, and under any promise of contingent indemnity, to board and detain American vessels, whose nationality may be questioned, in time of peace. I can hardly persuade myself that the British Government has yet realized to itself the startling magnitude of this new claim of maritime police. If they have the right to ascertain, by visit and examination, the genuineness of every flag which their cruisers may encounter on the high seas, do they not, in effect, revive and extend to the whole ocean the obsolete claim of sovereignty and dominion which they formerly asserted within the narrow sea surrounding their own island. Every right has, too, its corresponding remedies. If British cruisers have the right to visit and detain all flags they meet on the ocean, to satisfy themselves, by personal examination, of their genuineness,—they might enforce that right, in case of any attempt to resist or evade it on the part of the vessels sought to be visited, by the summary naval remedies of capture and confiscation. This is the settled maritime law, in regard to the right of search of neutral vessels in time of war. If a neutral vessel attempt to resist or escape from the exercise of the right of search, she, by that fact alone, subjects herself to capture and condemnation as lawful prize. The same consequence would analogically attend the right of visit claimed by Great Britain in time of peace, if it exist (as she contends it does) under the law of nations; and a vessel on the high seas, conscious of the integrity of its flag, and unwilling to submit to the indignity and vexation of an inquisitorial visit from a British cruiser, might find herself punished for her contumacy, by a speedy capture, followed by a sentence of condemnation in a British admiralty court.

* The language of Admiral Sir Charles Napier, in the House of Commons, on the 21 of February last, when the subject of the American treaty was under discussion, may serve as an admonition of the necessity of looking to what may seem to be even remote consequences, in the treatment of these delicate questions of maritime law. In the London Times of the 3d inst., he is reported to have said, while strongly condemning the treaty, that "Lord Ashburton ought to have stated to the Government of the United States that we would never depart from the right of taking British seamen out of American ships."

The wise and enlightened statesmen of England cannot but feel that an innovation like this upon the established law of nations, in this, the nineteenth century—involving, as its natural corollary, consequences so startling—would, by a necessary instinct of self-preservation, unite all the other maritime powers of the world in one firm confederacy against them, for the protection of their common rights. I trust in the influence of reflections such as these, joined to that sober spirit of practical moderation which has thus far favorably distinguished the present public councils of Great Britain, to insure the continuance of general peace. In the maintenance of peace and harmony between England and America, there are so many reciprocal interests of the highest importance involved, commercial, moral, and political, that nothing can be wanted but a calm and collected temper on the part of the constituted authorities of both countries, unmoved by those general denunciations on the one side and the other—which are, unfortunately, but too well fitted to inflame national animosities—to bring to a safe and satisfactory termination every remaining question between them.

SPEECH OF MR. MILLER,
OF NEW JERSEY.

In Senate, February 17, 1843—On the bill to restore to General Jackson the fine imposed upon him by the district court of the United States in Louisiana.

Mr. PRESIDENT: The professed object of this bill is to refund to General Jackson a fine of $1,000, imposed upon him by the district court of the United States in Louisiana, on the 31st day of March, 1815, for certain contempts committed by him against that court.

Although this be the humble design of the bill—the mere settlement of a private claim—there has been thrown around it an unusual degree of interest and feeling. It has been magnified into a public measure, and is pressed upon our consideration as if it were a great national concern. The political parties of the day are taking sides upon this measure; politicians are making a hobby of it; State Legislatures have passed resolutions instructing their Senators to vote for the bill; and even the President of the United States has deemed it his duty to bring this matter before Congress, under that clause of the Constitution which authorizes him to give information of the state of the Union. Thus, sir, has this private bill been withdrawn from the great vortex of neglected claims, and magnified into a public measure, and glorified into an affair that concerns the state of the Union.

The urgency with which this matter is pressed, is not very complimentary to our sense of equal rights. There are many poor claimants, who, for years past, have been urging Congress to decide upon their claims, and who have gone down to their graves bankrupt through our inaction; yet no sooner is this claim presented, than our Justice tears the bandage from her eyes; and, beholding the hero of New Orleans, thrusts aside every other claim, and proceeds, with timid and nervous haste, to comply with his demand.

The notoriety which has been given to this claim, the various and powerful collateral influences which have been brought to its aid, induce me to pause and examine more carefully the merits of this bill.

Neither the political influence nor the military renown which surround the character of the distinguished applicant, shall induce me to regard this claim with more complacency than I would look upon the petition of the poorest man or the most humble soldier that ever served his country.

I wish to confine myself to the simple facts of the case, and upon them, and them alone, to decide this matter. All that has been said about the glorious victory of New Orleans—the services, civil and military, of General Jackson—ought not to affect this matter. They form no part of the facts of the case, and should, therefore, have no influence upon the judgment of the Senate. General Jackson himself discards all these collateral matters, and puts his claim upon the ground that the sentence imposed upon him by Judge Hall was illegal and unjust. I read from his letter, dated Hermitage, August 1, 1842, directed to Jacob Gibson, esq.:

"DEAR SIR: I have the pleasure to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 19th ultimo, informing me that a joint resolution passed the Legislature of New Hampshire, at their June session, 1842, of which you are a member, instructing your Senators in Congress, and requesting your Representatives, to use their efforts to procure the passage of a law, by Congress, to refund to me, with interest, the fine imposed by Judge Hall, in 1815, for an alleged contempt, &c.

"For this unsolicited interposition of the Legislature of New Hampshire to have expunged from the record this iniquitous imputation upon my character, by that unjust and vindictive Judge Hall, sitting in his own cause, from whose fiat there was no appeal, it deserves, as it receives, my sincere thanks."

If I could be satisfied that this sentence was iniquitous or unjust; or, even if legal, yet, if it were imposed upon General Jackson for an act required by the honest discharge of his official duties,—I would, without hesitation, vote to refund the fine: for I hold it to be the duty of every Government to sustain its public servants in the honest discharge of their duties; and, although they may occasionally mistake the law, yet, if that were an honest mistake, I would not punish the agent, but rather let the consequence fall upon the principal—the Government—for whose benefit the act was perpetrated.

Upon these acknowledged principles, let us examine the case. In the first place, we have before us the record of the proceedings and the sentence, certified under the seal of the court. By this record, it appears that General Jackson was regularly summoned, heard, tried, and condemned, in and by one of the district courts of this Government, for contempt of court, and fined in the sum of $1,000. It is also admitted that the General submitted to the judgment of the court, and paid the fine; and the judgment still remains of record, having been acquiesced in by the complainant from that time to this—a period of twenty-eight years.

In ordinary cases, we might here say to the claimant, "you are estopped by this record, and by your acquiescence in its truth for the space of nearly thirty years." It is true that the Government never pleads the statute of limitations, yet there are cases in which the lapse of time becomes a material and substantial matter of defence. The death of the actors in the scene, the forgetfulness of the living, may deprive the case of many of its essential facts. If the State should derive no advantage from time, neither should the applicant be permitted to lay by until death has silenced his adversary, or until some new adventitious circumstance has popularized his claim.

But, sir, I am willing to forego all these considerations, and to look behind this record, and examine the facts upon which it is founded.

What are these facts? On the evening of the 5th of March, 1815, about two months after the battle of New Orleans, Mr. Morel, a counsellor at law, called at the house of Judge Hall, and presented to him a petition to issue a writ of habeas corpus in behalf of Louis Louallier, who, as said, was held in illegal imprisonment under the order of General Jackson. The judge, after reading the petition, and swearing Mr. Morel as to the truth of the facts therein stated, endorsed upon the petition the following order:

'Let the prayer of the petition be granted, and the petitioner be brought before me at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning."

At the time of granting this order, Judge Hall stated to Mr. Morel "that he thought it would be proper for him to write a letter to General Jackson, to inform him that the writ had been awarded." Mr. Morel then states that he carried the order to the clerk of the district court, and then went to his office, where he wrote the letter intimated by the Judge, of which the following is a copy:

"To his Excellency Major General Jackson.

"SIR: I have the honor to inform your excellency that, as counsel, I have made application to his honor Dominick A. Hall, judge of the district court of the United States, for a writ of habeas corpus in behalf of Mr. Louallier, who conceived that he was illegally arrested by order of your excellency; and that the said writ has been awarded, and is returnable to-morrow, 6th inst., at 11 o'clock, a. m.

"I have the honor to be your excellency's most humble and obedient servant, P. L. MOREL, Counsellor at Law."

As soon as General Jackson read this letter, as it appears by the affidavits of Mr. Duplessis and Colonel Arbuckle, he issued the following order:

"HEADQUARTERS 7TH MILITARY DISTRICT,
"NEW ORLEANS, March 5, 1815—7 o'clock, p. m.

"Having received proof that Dominick A. Hall has been aiding and abetting and exciting mutiny within my camp, you will forthwith order a detachment to arrest and confine him, and report to me as soon as arrested. You will be vigilant; the agents of our enemy are more numerous than was expected. You will be guarded against escapes.

"ANDREW JACKSON,
Major General commanding.

"LT. Col. ARBUCKLE, 3d Infantry."

At about eight o'clock of the evening of the same 5th of March, a detachment of sixty armed men, under the command of Major Butler, were seen marching hastily through the streets of New Orleans; they entered the dwelling of Judge Hall, forcibly arrested him, and conveyed him to the military barracks, where he was held a prisoner until the 11th of March, when General Jackson ordered him to be removed out of the city, as appears from the following order:

"HEADQUARTERS 7TH MILITARY DIVISION,
"NEW ORLEANS, March 11, 1815.

"SIR: You will detail from your troop a discreet non-commissioned officer and four men, and direct them to call on the officer commanding the 3d United States infantry for Dominick A. Hall, who is confined in the guard-house for exciting mutiny and desertion within the encampment of the city.

"Upon the receipt of the prisoner, the non-commissioned officer will conduct him up the coast, beyond the lines of General Carroll's encampment, deliver him the enclosed order, and set him at liberty. By command:

"THOS. BUTLER, Aid de-camp.

"Capt. P. V. OGDEN,
Commanding troop of cavalry, New Orleans."

From these facts it appears—

1. That the only act committed by Judge Hall, previous to his arrest, was the granting an order for a writ of habeas corpus, upon the sworn petition of a citizen, alleging that he was illegally imprisoned.

2. That for this act, and this alone, Gen. Jackson ordered the person of the Judge to be seized and imprisoned.

3. That the object of this arrest was to defeat the writ of habeas corpus.

I say that the only act charged upon Judge Hall was the order, "Let the prayer of the petitioner be granted". There is not a particle of evidence to be collected from the record, from the affidavits made by the several actors in the same, or from the various statements made by General Jackson himself, charging upon the Judge any other cause of offence than this. General Jackson did not even wait for the consummation of the order; but, as soon as he read the courteous note from Mr. Morel, informing him that an application had been made for a habeas corpus, the order for arrest was forthwith issued and put in force. It is true that, in the order for the arrest of Judge Hall, General Jackson states that he had received proof "that Dominick A. Hall had been aiding and abetting and exciting mutiny in his camp."

Now, sir, I ask for this proof. Can any of the friends of General Jackson point it out? Can they name the witness, living or dead, who has ever stated a fact implicating Judge Hall in the high crime charged in that order? General Jackson speaks of proof—not allegation, hearsay, or surmise. Surely, no honorable man, respecting the rights and liberties of his fellow-citizens, would ever venture, not only to make a charge like this against a highly respectable functionary, but to condemn him unheard, without having plenary evidence of his guilt. Yet, when we examine the facts of this case, we find that the only proof upon which Gen. Jackson acted was the letter of Mr. Morel, informing him that Judge Hall had granted an order for a writ of habeas corpus. This was the proof that Judge Hall had been abetting and exciting mutiny. The awarding of a writ of habeas corpus declared to be a proof of a mutinous act; the performing a constitutional duty converted into a crime; the great bulwark of human liberty struck down at a blow, and made the cause of oppression and imprisonment! Does the record of any court, civil or military, upon the face of the earth, present an example of an arrest of a freeman, upon proof like this?

After reading that peremptory order for the arrest, I confess that I felt anxious, for the sake of General Jackson, and for the honor of the country, to find some additional fact—even a circumstance—that might afford some excuse for a proceeding so bold and arbitrary; but I have searched in vain. No other proof can be found. And the case stands now as it did on the 5th of March, 1815—a Judge arrested and imprisoned for mutiny, upon proof that he had granted an order for a writ of habeas corpus!

I now proceed to show that General Jackson's object in arresting the Judge was to defeat the writ of habeas corpus. This is an important point, involving a mighty principle, deeply affecting the liberty of the citizen and the supremacy of the laws and the Constitution of the country.

If it should appear, from the investigation of this case, that the arrest of Judge Hall was not for inciting mutiny, as alleged in General Jackson's order, nor necessary to the defence of New Orleans, as his friends insist, but an unnecessary, arbitrary act, perpetrated for the purpose of harassing or overawing the officers of justice in the performance of a high constitutional duty,—it will present such a glaring case of outrage and wrong as none can venture to justify, and few, I hope, be found to excuse.

Upon this point also depends, in a great measure, the authority of the judge to proceed for the contempt of court. The question is this: Did General Jackson imprison Judge Hall for the purpose of preventing any further proceeding by the court upon the writ? Let us examine the facts carefully.

The order for the writ was granted on the evening of the 5th of March; Mr. Morel carried this order to the clerk the same evening, and wrote immediately to General Jackson the letter which I have already read to the Senate. This letter first informed General Jackson of the writ; and upon this information, and this alone, he ventured to issue the order for the arrest at 7 o'clock the same evening. This appears from the affidavit of Mr. Claiborne, the clerk of the court, in which he states that, in the evening of the same 5th of March, he called upon the General, in company with the marshal, Mr. Duplessis, and others:

"The General showed me a letter he had received from Mr. Morel, the counsel of Mr. Louallier, informing him (the General) that a writ of habeas corpus had issued in the case of Mr. Louallier."

This witness further says, that in the course of time he was with General Jackson; and the conversation turning upon Judge Hall, the General observed—

"That he had no personal prejudices against the Judge; but that his conduct in the instance in question had brought him under the cognizance of his (the General's) general order; that this was his (the General's) camp, and that no person or power must or should be over him in it."

But, sir, there is still stronger proof upon this point. General Jackson, in his letter of the 23d December, 1842, says:

"On the subject of Louallier's arrest, it should be known that he secreted himself from the issuing of the order for his arrest until he had made arrangements with Judge Hall for the habeas corpus; and when arrested and delivered to the colonel of the provost guard, being told that I had given directions for his good treatment, he replied, with thanks, that it was unnecessary, as he would be there but a short time. He was asked why? His reply was, that Judge Hall had issued a writ of habeas corpus for him, on which Colonel Arbuckle wrote to me asking advice. I directed him to keep the prisoner as long as he could wield a bayonet, unless he was liberated by my order. Having made inquiry into the matter, and found that Hall had so issued the writ, I forthwith gave orders for the arrest of Dominick A. Hall, and sent Captain Butler, of South Carolina, and Dr. Wm. Butler, with a file of men, for that purpose."

General Jackson's determination to defeat this writ does not stop with the arrest of the Judge. He had been informed that an original order for the writ had been made by the Judge, and filed with the clerk of the court. Fearing that this order might in some way interfere with his purpose, the General, at about 9 o'clock in the evening, sends one of his aids (Major Chotard) with a written order to the clerk, requiring him to give up the original order of the Judge. The clerk refuses to comply, but consents to accompany Major Chotard to the General's quarters; when the following scene took place, which I will permit the clerk to describe in his own language:

"The General showed me a letter he had received from Mr. Morel, the counsel of Mr. Louallier, informing him (the General) that a writ of habeas corpus had issued in the case of Louallier. I told the General that the writ had not issued; he asked me for the reason. I answered, because the marshal had told me he would not serve it on the Sabbath; and that it being returnable at 11 o'clock on Monday, I thought it would be time enough to issue it in the morning. The General asked me if I intended to issue it? I said that it was my duty to do so, and that it would issue. At this the General handed me a printed paper, which he said was his general order, and observed that that order would show me he would do his duty also. The General asked me for the original order of Judge Hall before mentioned. It was written on the back of Mr. Louallier's petition, and I handed the General the paper. The General read the order, and also the affidavit of Mr. Morel, which was at the foot of the petition, and observed to me that the dates of both the order and the affidavit had been altered, and asked what all this juggling was about? I assured him there was no juggle, and the reason of an alteration in the dates was as I have stated above. The General mentioned to me he should keep the paper in his own possession. I observed to him that there was an order of court that no original paper should be delivered out of the office. The General said he should keep it under his own responsibility; that it should be safely preserved, and that he would give me a certified copy of it; which he did."

Here it is important to observe, that, prior to this interview, General Jackson was under the impression that the writ had issued. He was led into this mistake by the letter from Mr. Morel, stating that the writ had been awarded. As soon as the clerk informs him that the writ had not been issued, but was still under the control of the clerk, the General, with all that military quickness peculiar to his character, perceives that the writ is still at large. This new difficulty must be overcome; and he forthwith sets to work like a hero to strangle the writ in the hand of the clerk. "The General," says the clerk, "asked me if I intended to issue it. I said that it was my duty to do so, and that I would issue it. At this, the General handed me a printed paper, which, he said, was his 'general order;' and observed that that order would show me that he intended to do his duty also."

Failing, by this threat, to intimidate the clerk from issuing the writ, the General next proceeds, by stratagem hardly to be justified even by the arbitrary rules of martial law, to obtain possession of the original petition and order. At the request of the General, the clerk hands him the paper to read; he refuses to return it, although the clerk urges upon him the rule of the court, "that no original paper should be delivered out of the office." He replies that he will keep it under his own responsibility; and then despatches the clerk with a copy of his own record, the original remaining in the pocket of General Jackson. But, sir, the case does not stop here. The General understood, from this interview with the clerk, that, although he had shopped the Judge, and pocketed the order, the writ would, nevertheless, issue. He therefore turns to the marshal, (who was present with the clerk at this interview,) and, after remarking that he had shopped the Judge, said "that he would treat any person who might improperly meddle with his camp in the same manner that he had treated the Judge." The marshal further testifies, that it was manifest, from the whole tenor of the conversation, that the General intended to disregard the writ.

These several acts on the part of General Jackson; the sudden arrest of the Judge between the test and return of the process; the attempt to suppress the writ by intimidating the clerk; the surreptitious manner of obtaining possession of the record; the threatening language to the marshal, and the utter disregard of the writ itself, can admit of but one construction. They prove, beyond all doubt, the settled purpose of General Jackson to defeat, by means of tyrannical and irresistible force, the legal operation of the habeas corpus. And most thoroughly did he succeed in his purpose; for he demolished the court, bullied its officers, carried off its records, and trampled beneath his feet, as so much blank paper, its record and seal.

By way of excusing these arbitrary proceedings—for no one even attempts to justify them—it is said that they were necessary to the military defence of New Orleans. I might here show, by incontestable evidence that the city at this time needed no extraordinary defence; that the enemy, defeated and routed by the battle of the 8th of January, had retired from the city, and were not to be found within one hundred and fifty miles; that, in fact, the war was over and peace declared, and known in New Orleans; and the city, on the 5th of March, could have been safely defended by the same band of sixty armed soldiers who expended their military ardor in storming the house and arresting the body of Judge Hall. All this, however, is irrelevant to the present inquiry. Could any state of things, militant or peaceful, an enemy present or absent, a siege or a blockade, a victory or a defeat—could any emergency of war render necessary to the defence of a city that a judge should be imprisoned for the peaceful act of granting an order for a writ of habeas corpus?

Is there anything in that act which could possibly affect the defence of a city? Could the imprisonment of Judge Hall add to the strength of ramparts? Would its battlements be enlarged, or its towers strengthened, by the incarceration of his body? Were the seizure of the record and the duress of the clerk necessary military movements of defence?

This writ was directed to General Jackson, and upon him it was served; he had the custody of the person for whose benefit it issued, and it was within his option either to have the body before the Judge, according to the command of the writ, or to return that the safety of the city required the retention of the prisoner. If he had taken the latter course, we might then with propriety discuss the other question which has been agitated here, (but which is, in my opinion, irrelevant to the case,)—the legality of the imprisonment of Mr. Louallier. But, sir, he determines to take neither of these courses. Not satisfied with disobeying the writ and detaining the prisoner, and with neglecting to give any excuse or reason for the detention, he imprisoned the Judge also. The only excuse General Jackson could allege for disobeying the writ, was the urgent necessity of retaining his custody over Louallier: having determined to retain him, his whole object was accomplished. Where was the necessity of taking the other step? Assuming supreme power, under what he called martial law, over all the civil authorities, and surrounded by a victorious army obedient to his will, Louallier was as secure under his custody after as before the issuing of the writ of habeas corpus. The imprisonment of Louallier could not be rendered less secure by the liberty of Judge Hall. Where, then, I ask, was the necessity for this wanton and cruel act of oppression? Neither the safety of the city nor the security of the prisoner required it; and the only reason that can be assigned for this proceeding is the one I have named—an arbitrary determination on the part of General Jackson to defeat any further proceeding upon the habeas corpus.

The minority report, which accompanies this bill, does not, in my opinion, touch the true point in this case. That report merely attempts to excuse and justify General Jackson for the arrest and detention of Mr. Louallier. It says not a word about the arrest of the Judge, nor offers the slightest apology for the contempt offered to the court. The question is stated in the report as follows:

"This question, however, having been introduced by the committee, the undersigned submits, that, in time of war and of imminent public danger, it may be the duty of the commander to arrest those regarded as traitors, spies, or mutineers, within the limits of his camp—especially in cases where it was obvious to him that his refusal to exercise such power would involve the disbanding of his forces, the defeat of his army, and the surrender of that army, and of the country which he was bound to defend. The alternative, as he fully believed, was to make the arrest or the abandonment of his country's standard, and the surrender of one of her greatest cities to a powerful enemy, whose motto of victory involved indiscriminate plunder and licentious outrage. Under such circumstances, should he make the arrest and save the country? To this question there will be but one response from the heart of every true American patriot."

Now, sir, as one of the American people, my heart fully responds to the sentiment, that, in time of war and of imminent public danger, it may be the duty of the commander to arrest traitors, spies, and mutineers, within the limits of his camp. I would even go further, and excuse the General for hanging traitors and spies under such circumstances. But we must not confuse the innocent with the guilty, the patriot with the traitor, even to add to the honor and glory of General Jackson. Was Judge Hall a traitor, or a spy, or a mutineer? Is there a fact or a circumstance, stated in that report, or anywhere else, implicating him in either of these high crimes? The imprisonment of Louallier, the circumstances under which it was made, and the reasons for its continuance, are distinct matters from the imprisonment of Judge Hall: the former may be excused, and even justified, without at all affecting the legality of the latter. May not a man be legally imprisoned, and yet a judge be permitted to grant a writ of habeas corpus, to inquire into the cause of his duress, without subjecting himself to the penalties of the crime which rests upon the prisoner?

'The law (says this report) which justified this act was the great law of self-defence: it was the law of necessity."

What act? The arrest of Judge Hall? No. The honorable gentleman who made the report does not mean that arbitrary proceeding. He could find no necessity so urgent, no self-defence so pressing, as to legalize, under any code of law, civil or martial, an act so destructive to personal security and civil liberty.

Did these several acts on the part of General Jackson amount to a contempt of court? To answer this question satisfactorily, we must ascertain what constitutes this offence. The best authorities in the law describe it as follows:

"A contempt is a disobedience to the court, or an opposing or despising the authority, justice, or dignity thereof. It commonly consists in a party's doing otherwise than he is enjoined to do, or not doing what he is commanded or required by the process, order, or decree of the court. Sometimes it arises by one or more, their opposing or disturbing the execution or service of the process of the court, or using force to the party that serves it; sometimes by using words importing scorn, reproach, or diminution of the court, its process, orders, officers, or ministers, upon executing such process or orders."

The authority to restrain and punish in a summary way acts of this nature, is essential to the existence of every court. It is part of the law of its judicial life necessary to its self-preservation. It is the right to resist or punish, on the spot, and without delay, any insult or act calculated to disturb or restrain its judicial action in a cause or proceeding depending. The law of contempt embraces the right to maintain the honor and order of the court; to protect its officers in the legal discharge of their duty; to preserve its records; or to defend its process and writs, in their service or return, against insult or violence.

If we deny to a court this power of self-protection, the obstinacy or the violence of any one man may at any moment stop the proceedings in a cause, bar the doors of your courts, and break up the administration of law and justice.

Was not that the result in the case before us? A legal proceeding had been commenced—a writ issued under the authority and seal of the court, and made returnable at a certain time and place. The object of the writ required that it should be executed with as little delay as possible; its purposes being to inquire into the cause of the imprisonment of a citizen, who alleged that he was illegally deprived of his liberty.

Now, sir, if a person, conscious that these proceedings are in progress, and desirous of defeating them, wrests from the hands of the clerk the order and petition upon which the proceedings are founded, and, between the test and return, seizes with armed force and imprisons the judge who issued the writ, and thus prevents him from being present to hear the parties on the return day, is he not guilty of a gross contempt? If this be not contempt of court, then, alas! are our courts beneath contempt.

This is, in fact, something more than a contempt. For a contempt is seldom so outrageous as to deprive the tribunal of its existence; but here the blow was so fierce and fatal, that the whole court, with all its functions and faculties, judicial, ministerial, and executive, together with its record, process, and seal—all fell paralyzed in death beneath the arm of the hero of New Orleans.

Thus far I have spoken only of the outrage to the Judge—of the contempt to the court. These, unjustifiable as they are, might have been excused by an indulgent and grateful people; but there is exposed by these proceedings a still deeper outrage, and a still higher contempt—an outrage against the Constitution, a contempt of the writ of habeas corpus. I could forgive much, in consideration of the military services of General Jackson; but who that reveres the institutions of his country can sanction a wanton breach of its Constitution? Who that loves liberty can excuse the blow that strikes down the bulwarks of its defence?

In the erection and maintenance of a Government founded upon liberty and law, principles, and sometimes things, are of more importance than men. Thousands of lives were sacrificed to obtain our Constitution. Our ancestors contended for years, amidst revolutions and persecutions in the field and in the Senate, for the establishment of that great instrument of English liberty—the writ of habeas corpus; and shall we, their descendants, yield both these proud trophies of patriotism to the insatiable ambition and craving vanity of one man? Gen. Jackson, in the vigor of his youth, was willing to sacrifice his life in defence of his country; and does he now, in old age, grudge a thousand pieces of silver, expended in vindication of a principle, deprived of which his country would not be worth defending?

Our fathers, mindful of the history of the writ of habeas corpus, and duly appreciating its importance in the protection of personal and civil liberty against the aggressions of arbitrary power, did, in and by the Constitution, secure the privilege of this writ to every American citizen in the following words:

"The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when, in cases of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it."

Mark the words, "the privilege of the writ"—a known right, a common prerogative, used and enjoyed by the people before and at the time of the adoption of the Constitution; and which that instrument does not grant, but merely preserves. The power to suspend this great common-law privilege is reserved to Congress, the Representatives of the people; and even then their control over it is limited to two emergencies—rebellion or invasion; and not even then, unless the public safety require it.

Of little value would be that constitutionally preserved privilege, if the power to suspend it is left in the hands of every commander in our army and navy, to be exercised according to his judgment or whim; neither the Executive, the commander-in-chief of the army and navy, the judge who issues the writ—no, not even the sovereign people, for whose benefit this privilege is reserved, have the power to suspend it; Congress, and Congress alone, can do it.

This is acknowledged by all. Yet we are told that there is a law superior to the Constitution—the law of war, called martial law! Do gentlemen mean to say that a declaration of war abrogates the Constitution? Was not our Constitution made for war as well as for peace? Is its potency only to be felt in the quiet unresisting times of peace, but lost amid the din of arms and shouts of victory? It would, indeed, be an ill-constructed instrument for the government of a free people, if it made no provision for the protection of the property, the liberty, and the life of a citizen at a time when all these rights demand the most efficient support, and require the most powerful protection.

But this martial law—what is it? What its definition? From whence does it proceed, and what are its limits?

This thing called martial law once had a kind of existence in England. It was felt, but not seen, dwelling in the dark corners of the star-chamber, seizing citizens in the darkness of the night, and dragging them off to be tried and executed by armed men; in its character, half military, half civil—a court-martial for trial of civil offences.

So ill-shapen, so monstrous, so undefinable was this law, that Judge Blackstone, who could, in one short sentence, define the municipal law of England, found himself utterly at fault in describing the martial law, and contents himself by telling us that it is the absence of all law. If I should undertake to define this law, it would be by reversing Judge Blackstone's definition of municipal law, to wit: "Martial law has no rule of action, does not proceed from the supreme power of the State, neither commanding what is right, nor prohibiting what is wrong."

If by this law is meant that code of laws which govern men in arms—the rules and regulations of an army and navy—we all understand it. But when you claim for this law a supremacy over the Constitution; when you extend its jurisdiction over the citizen—over the life, liberty, and property of the private individual, and subject him and all his rights to be dealt with according to the will or whim of a military commander—you present a monster, a tyrant, under whose government no freeman could live in safety for an hour.

General Jackson seems to have been under the impression that this constitutional privilege was only to be enjoyed in time of peace; that the writ of habeas corpus was a tame, quiet process, to be sent to county jails, and only obligatory upon sheriffs and turnkeys; but upon a major general, whose camp is a city, and whose only law is a camp order, enforced at the point of the bayonet! what avail parchments, writs, and paper constitutions? Shall the soldier yield to the civil marshal? Shall the general yield to the judge?

General Jackson forgot, at the time, the history of that writ. You, sir, know that it had its origin in war and civil commotion, when, under pretence of an urgent necessity and public safety, men were seized by armed soldiers, thrown into prison, and kept there, unheard and untried, by the mere mandate of the King.

That man Jenks, whose imprisonment was one of the immediate causes that produced the famous act of habeas corpus, was a citizen of London, on the popular or factious side. He was committed by the King in council, for a mutinous speech in Guildhall. The Chancellor, on an application for a habeas corpus, declined to issue it during the vacation; and the Chief Justice of the King's Bench made so many difficulties about issuing the writ, that Jenks lay in prison several weeks. This arbitrary imprisonment of an humble citizen of London excited the spirit of liberty throughout all England; and notwithstanding the mandate of the King in council, and the craven prevarication of the Chancellor and of the Chief Justice, the Commons of England never rested until they had secured by law an effectual remedy against any future outrage upon the liberty of the citizen. That remedy has, since that day, been sacredly preserved as a great landmark in the progressive advancement of civil liberty. It has been called the second Magna Charta of English rights. Our fathers brought it with them as a cherished jewel; they re-enacted it in every State Legislature; they embodied it in the Constitution of the Union; and there it now stands, stereotyped forever, in these words: "The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended."

From the time when the commons of England triumphed over the arbitrary martial-law power of the crown—from the day of the enactment of the habeas corpus, in the reign of Charles the Second—from the formation of our Constitution—through all the commotions, revolutions, and wars in England and in America—no King, no President, no popular military chieftain ever ventured to suspend, even for an hour, the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, until General Jackson, on the 5th of March, 1815, and in the 39th year of our independence, took upon himself the responsibility.

This case stands alone. For one hundred and fifty years has this writ been revered as the guardian spirit of human liberty, pursuing unmolested the even tenor of its way, commanding obedience from every authority, entering every prison, descending into every dungeon, and, through grated doors and arms of steel, bringing forth the prisoner, together with the cause of his imprisonment, to the light of day.

Now, sir, I ask, can we, the Senate of the United States, existing by and acting under the Constitution, excuse, and thereby justify, this suspension of the habeas corpus? No, sir; we cannot; we dare not. I would do anything for General Jackson rather than this. Erect monuments, make triumphal arches, build temples in honor of the glorious victory at New Orleans; but I cannot sacrifice a great constitutional principle—a principle more valuable to this people than a hundred cities, more glorious than a thousand victories.

Why is this measure urged upon Congress just at this time? After sleeping for a quarter of a century, this claim suddenly awakes, as by the touch of a magician's wand; the whole country becomes agitated with an anxious sense of justice, brooking no delay. The public treasure groans to be delivered of the fine money; and General Jackson and his friends can live no longer under the foul imputation of the sentence. Why this sudden outbreak of justice, gratitude, and sensibility? Were not all the facts of the case as well known twelve years ago, as they are at the present moment? Has delay advanced the validity of the claim? Has neglect aroused our gratitude? Has time made the outrage more glaring?

Passing over the eight years of General Jackson's administration, (during which a sense of delicacy might forbid action upon this subject,) how can we account for the silence of Mr. Van Buren, during the four years of his administration? Did his keen eye not perceive this stain upon the character of his great benefactor? Was his gratitude so obtuse that it could not give a word or a hint that the thing would be agreeable? Or was it that, having glory enough in those days, this little matter of the thousand dollars fine was laid by for a season of scarcity?

I believe I know that this measure has here and elsewhere many honest supporters. The honorable Senator from Missouri, who introduced the bill, has too much sincerity and honesty of character ever to advocate a measure here which he does not believe to be right and just. Yet, sir, from all that I have seen and heard, I cannot divest myself of the impression that a certain aspirant to the Presidency is attempting, through this measure, to use once more the name and influence of Gen. Jackson to obtain a second time the object of his ambition. Having once been warmed and illuminated by the meridian influences of his glorious predecessor, he has, during a short eclipse, been examining with telescopic accuracy, the clouded face of the great luminary, to discover, if he could, some little spot from which might be elicited a solitary ray of reflected glory.

In order to get at this little matter of glorification, the life and history of the old hero have been conned over to find, if possible, some dubious point of official conduct—some unjustified act—some unvarnished spot, a vanity not satisfied, an insult unavenged; and, at last, this matter of the fine is fixed upon as an offensive object in the picture, and we are called upon to varnish it over by legislative enactment. Let me say to the friends of Gen. Jackson, you are not true limners; you will spoil the painting by this varnish. It is these rough points and dark shades that give character and individuality to the picture. Smooth them down, or gild them over, and it will no longer be a true likeness of our responsibility-taking hero. It is better for all parties that we leave this matter as the history of the times records it. Let the controversy between the civil and military power—between the General and the Judge—remain settled as it is by the record. It is well settled, and we cannot alter it if we would. The hero General met the hero Judge in sharp conflict; the General imprisoned the Judge, and the Judge fined the General; the one lost his liberty, the other his money. We cannot now readjust the matter upon equal terms. You may gratify the feelings of General Jackson by returning this fine; but what becomes of the outrage upon the Judge? Is there no sympathy for his wrongs? Dragged from his house by armed men; marched through the public streets; branded with crime; the object of scorn and contempt; imprisoned, and then banished as an outlawed traitor—his wrongs have never been redressed. He went down to his grave an injured and insulted man, long to be remembered for his unequal contest with the hero of New Orleans. Not so with General Jackson. This petty fine, this sentence of contempt, now remembered by him with so much soreness, was unheeded at the time, amidst the shouts of his triumph; and was, for a while, forgotten, in the enjoyment of those high honors bestowed upon him by his grateful country. Yet his friends are not satisfied. The record of this sentence is still in existence. After twenty-eight years of glory won and enjoyed in other fields, they now propose to conduct their hero, with all Congress in his train, back to the first field of his triumph, New Orleans; not to celebrate his victory over the enemies of his country, but rather to sanction his triumph over the laws and Constitution of our Republic; and the grand ceremony of this fête will be to tear in fragments, over the grave of Dominick A. Hall, this record—the only monument left us of an independent and upright judge. I, for one, will have no part in the pageant.

SPEECH OF MR. BARNARD,

OF NEW YORK,

In the House of Representatives, February 20, 1843—In Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the bill reported from the Committee of Ways and Means in relation to treasury notes.

Mr. BARNARD offered to add to that bill, by way of amendment, the substance of a bill laid on the table some time since by him, and printed, and which, at the time, he had proposed to offer as a substitute for the exchequer bill of the Select Committee on the currency, (Mr. CUSHING's bill,) whenever that bill should be taken up. Mr. BARNARD's bill, now offered as an amendment to the treasury note bill, was entitled "A bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to borrow a sum of money, not exceeding fifteen millions of dollars, of State banks, and to adopt an equal amount of currency, which shall be receivable in payment of Government dues."

This amendment having been received—

Mr. BARNARD addressed the committee to the following effect:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: On the whole, sir, I do not know that any more fit occasion for bringing forward the provisional measure on the subject of the currency which I have had the honor to propose, could well be presented, than that which is now offered; and I have felt obliged, therefore, to decline the appeal made to me by my friend, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. FILLMORE,] that I would forbear to press this measure at the present time. I must insist on embracing this occasion to discharge myself of a great public duty; and, having a very distinct notion of what this House owes to the country on the subject which I have now brought to its notice, I am not disposed to let this opportunity slip of exacting from it some action in regard to that subject. It will not do to say that my bill is not germane to the subject before the committee. The two subjects are intimately related. Nor will the plea of lack of time avail anything. If there is time to perpetuate an issue of twelve millions of treasury notes, for the relief of the treasury—which is what the bill of the Ways and Means proposes—there is time to consider a proposition for changing the form of that indebtedness—which is what my bill proposes, with the advantage of supplying to the country, by means of that change of form, what the country now so much needs, and so imperatively demands—an ample, and a safe, sound, and uniform national currency. It will not do to say, as we have heard said and repeated this morning, that the public business must first be done—as if there were no other public business than the passing of appropriation bills, and bills to issue or perpetuate treasury notes. Sir, this which I propose is public business, and public business of some consequence too; and, if gentlemen are not sensible of the fact now, they may be made so, perhaps, when our common master, the people, come to reckon with us on the subject. In the condition in which the monetary and business affairs of this Government and of this country now are, and have been for a considerable period, no one thing can be named of such indispensable necessity as the restoration of a sound and uniform national currency. It is the vital air to the body politic—an indispensable requisite to its healthy existence. It may, in my opinion, be now, at once, procured and restored, by a very simple and a very safe financial measure, which, for itself, and without reference to the matter of currency, is strongly demanded by the condition of the treasury.

The bill of the Ways and Means is professedly a bill for the relief of the treasury; and it proposes that relief through the old mode (become so hackneyed within the last six years) of treasury notes. This is the ready resort and panacea prescribed in these latter times, for all the distempers of our exhausted exchequer. Whenever this abused patient of ours—victim, as he has been, of alternate plethora and inanition—shows symptoms of collapse or syncope, forthwith he is to be blown up, like a bladder, with treasury notes. Treasury notes are his hartshorn and his lavender; they have recovered him from many a heart-sickness and deadly swoon, within the last six years; and it is really surprising how their virtues hold out, considering how frequently, and almost constantly, they have been resorted to and applied. Sir, I have never yet, I believe, voted for a treasury-note bill. I might do so, without any direct violation of conscience or principle, if I could see a proper case or exigency for a measure of the sort. They might be used, as exchequer bills are used in England, to anticipate incoming revenue; but they ought not to be lightly resorted to, to take the place of revenue, or as a mode of borrowing for the support of Government, especially in time of peace. They have now been thus employed for almost six years uninterruptedly. They were so used by the last Administration, against which we Whigs earnestly remonstrated; and, coming into legislative power, we Whigs have adopted and continued the practice—with how much more urgent necessity on our part, the country will determine. And it is now proposed to employ still further this means of raising the wind for the treasury; it is proposed to give authority to the treasury to reissue the whole batch of treasury notes now outstanding—some twelve millions of dollars, more or less—as they may be paid in for dues, or come in for redemption. The greater part are already past due, and do not come in for payment, only because we have added to our promise to pay interest on them till due—which was the footing on which they originally stood—a promise to pay interest on them till redeemed. And it is proposed by this bill to add the like promise in regard to the rest and residue of the outstanding notes. Sir, I do not like this Jeremy-Diddler way of supporting this Government. These notes, every one of them, were issued payable in one year from date, and it concerned the credit and honor of the Government that they should have been promptly met at maturity. This subsequent promise of paying interest, to prevent the holders from demanding payment of the principal—this purchase, in market overt, of the lenity and forbearance of our creditors—is not the sort of transaction that I, for one, can take any pride in, as an American citizen. If the Government unhappily could do no better, why, very well; and I hope there has been more actual necessity for this sort of proceeding than I have been able to discover. At any rate, coming, as the renewed proposition does, from the Committee of Ways and Means, I shall not set myself up against it; though it must be carried, if at all, by other votes than mine. I have not moved to strike out the bill of the Ways and Means, and substitute mine for it; I propose my bill as an amendment, to be added to theirs; they will consist very well with each other in the same enactment. If my plan should chance to be adopted, and then it should be found that the State banks should refuse to lend us money on the terms proposed, the treasury would still have the treasury notes to resort to; while, on the other hand, if the banks should assent to our terms and lend us the money, there would not only be no necessity for any reissue of treasury notes, but all the outstanding notes might be promptly redeemed. The bill of the Ways and Means is, as I have said, a bill for the relief of the treasury. So is mine; and, I venture to think, much the more important and necessary bill of the two, not only for the relief of the treasury, but for the relief of the country also.

But, Mr. Chairman, I am free to confess—indeed, I wish it to be understood—that my main purpose is to procure, by the plan I propose, a currency of national import and character for the country. This is the great want of the country. Upon this question, more than any other, the political revolution of 1840 turned. The Whig party came into power upon the solemn promise and pledge to give the country a sound national currency. The general expectation was, that this was to be done by means of a bank of the United States. The mode, however, was not so much dwelt upon; it was the object and the thing that was chiefly discussed, promised, and expected. The local currencies were in the most deranged condition; the utmost confusion reigned in the exchanges; the regular flow of business was obstructed and interrupted in all its channels. There was stagnation, and distress, and ruin everywhere. It was universally felt that the process of restoration must begin at Washington. It was this Federal Government which had brought on all this mischief, by its unhallowed war on the best currency the world ever saw, and which had then coolly turned its back on the confusion and desolation it had created, and declared that it did not belong to this Government to have anything to do with currency and exchanges. The demand of the people was, that it should have something to do with this subject; and that demand was uttered with the voice of authority, and in tones of thunder. They called on the name of the Whig party, which they clothed with the ensigns of political power, and commanded them to go promptly to the work of relief and restoration. And we promised to do it. The country must have a sound and uniform national currency, and we promised that it should be supplied. This was the only way to bring order, regularity, and safety out of the confusion and rottenness which prevailed in the local currencies and in the exchanges; and we promised it should be done. Before God, and many a cloud of witnesses, we made this solemn engagement. There was one condition, and one only, annexed, by necessary implication, to this engagement. The mode of reaching and accomplishing the object must be in strict conformity to the Constitution, and to our own well-understood principles. We were not bound to violate either the Constitution or our own consciences; but we were bound to accomplish the object, only leaving these intact.

And, Mr. Chairman, never was a great duty entered upon with more alacrity, resolution, and zeal. Never was there a more honest endeavor to perform an honest undertaking and trust. An extra session of Congress was convened, and we went to work like men at the subject of the currency, though, in the mean time, we had lost the elected head and chief of our party and of the Administration. Still, we did not shrink from our duty and our engagements. At that period, nothing but a bank was thought of in any quarter, whether in Congress, at the Treasury Department, or at the Executive mansion. Various plans were suggested—to Congress, in Congress, and by the Executive; and they were all plans of banks. Nobody seemed then to think or dream of anything else. By common consent and agreement, at that period, the currency of the country was to be supplied and regulated through an incorporated national bank. Two attempts were made in Congress to establish such a bank; two such banks in succession were created, to neither of which would the President yield his assent; and it became, at last, apparent to everybody that he would yield his assent to nothing in the shape or similitude of an incorporated national bank. Thus ended at once all hopes of supplying a currency by means of a national bank for the term of Mr. Tyler's administration. It remained to be seen whether the same object could be accomplished through any other agency, which should be free from constitutional and other insuperable difficulties. Mr. Tyler and some of his advisers were of opinion it could be; and a plan for this purpose was submitted to Congress from the Executive department at the last, as it has been again at the present session. This is the exchequer plan, which has gained, certainly, a great deal of notoriety, if it has not gained much success. It was silently condemned by Congress at the last session, and it has been condemned at the present session in this House by the most sweeping and significant vote which, I venture to say, was ever passed on a measure of Executive recommendation.

This condemnation, thus passed on the Executive plan of an exchequer, must be deemed to have reached, also, the same exchequer scheme as modified in the bill brought in by the Select Committee on the Currency, (Mr. CUSHING's bill.) Let the gentleman from Massachusetts bring his bill to the test of the yeas and nays, and he shall see how much, or rather how little, favor his scheme will command in this House. It is the same scheme, in substance, already stamped, not with disapproval merely, but with reprobation. The gentleman's exchequer differs from the Executive plan in two particulars, not unimportant in themselves, but in no manner affecting the character of the measure. It is the exchequer still; it is just what it was in its original conception, what it always has been, and always must be. It is an Executive treasury with sub-treasuries, as contradistinguished from "the treasury of the United States," as established by law in the first session of the first Congress, and employed from that day to this with the universal approval of the American people, excepting during one single year under the last Administration. It is also an Executive commercial bank of deposite and exchange—a Government bank, to be managed and conducted by officers of Executive appointment, and to deal with individuals on individual account.

One respect in which the gentleman from Massachusetts has modified the Executive plan is in withdrawing from the exchequer board and agencies the power to purchase exchange. The power to sell exchanges, however, remains, and may be exercised to any extent, and with all that latitude of discretion in regard to prices and persons which could not fail to make this machine a political engine of the grossest favoritism and corruption. At any rate, with this power to deal in exchanges, and the power to receive the money of individuals and furnish bank paper money therefor, the exchequer is out of all question a Government bank, and, as such, can never receive the support of those so regarding it, who desire to see the Constitution and Government preserved. Even the friends of the measure advocate it only by denying roundly that the exchequer is a Government bank—a denial which admits of no support, that I can discover, but naked and bold assertion.

Another modification of the executive plan, proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, is in substituting for any fund a specie basis of dollar for dollar for the paper issues of the Government. As a principle of banking, I must be allowed to say that I hold this proposition in no sort of respect. It is commended to our admiration by an epigrammatic remark of its author, that "for every paper eagle on the wing, it has a gold eagle in hand." But it is evident the gentleman has wholly mistaken the character and habits of the bird he was describing. He seems to suppose that these are gregarious—that they fly only in flocks, like wild geese in their migrations; and that when they get tired of being on the wing, and alight, they alight all at once and all together. It was important, therefore, in his estimation, to make provision beforehand for this peculiarity of habit, by having constantly on hand an equal number of golden eagles for his weary paper eagles to settle down upon. Now, this is certainly an error in the gentleman's natural history, which one so truly learned ought not to have made. It detracts materially from the merits of the contribution he was making to the interesting science of ornithology. These paper eagles are not gregarious; they fly either singly or in small detached covies; and, like swallows of a sunny day, some, and by far the greater number, are always on the wing while others are at rest. To drop the gentleman's figure, it would be a mere wanton waste of property, besides being a temptation to all manner of corruption, if the Government, issuing convertible paper, were to undertake to keep constantly on hand an amount of gold and silver equal to the issues. The idea of its necessity is not obsolete, it is merely absurd. By the very terms of his bill, the paper issues only to those who prefer it to gold and silver; and the same necessity which obliges the community to demand the paper instead of the coin in the first instance, must continue to operate as long as there remains any business to transact, and must lead the community to the continued use of the paper in preference to the coin. Nothing but a sudden and universal suspension of business throughout all the regions of industry and commerce, or a sudden and universal panic, shaking and unsettling the foundations of all credit and of the Government itself, could ever drive home in one day, or in one period, the whole outstanding mass of paper issues. There should always be a large and broad basis of specie for all issues of paper, so as to secure at once, as far as human calculation can go, actual convertibility and real confidence. No man has insisted more strongly or more uniformly on this than I have. But to go beyond this, and insist on making the metallic basis equal to the circulation, is a good deal worse than a blunder. If adopted by the Government, in case it turned banker, much more ought the same rule to be adopted by all the banks, and it could not end in anything but fraud; for the specie would as certainly disappear, as time passed on to show how useless a hoard it was. Either it would have this result, or issues would cease altogether; and that golden era, so much sighed after by the sublimated Democracy, would be brought in.

But the gentleman's dollar for dollar doctrine is not objectionable merely as a principle of banking; it is still more objectionable when taken in connexion with the sub-treasury feature of the exchequer plan. It makes his sub-treasury incomparably more dangerous than that of Mr. Van Buren. Under Mr. Van Buren's scheme, no moneys were to be kept in the hands of executive officers, except the surplus or casual balance of the ordinary revenues—it might be one or three millions. But the gentleman from Massachusetts proposes a sub-treasury, under which executive officers shall have in their personal custody not only all the surplus revenues of the Government, but also twenty millions more of good gold and silver, under the name of a redemption fund for outstanding issues! How could any man have the face to submit such a proposition to the Representatives of the American people; and to connect that proposition, too, with another for the establishment of an out-and-out, undisguised Government bank—and that, not a bank merely dealing with individuals on Government account, but dealing with individuals on individual account? And this offer and attempt is made by this republican, constitutional, limited Government of ours; and under an Administration that has distinguished itself by the obstinate constitutional scruples which it has set up against measures of the most salutary and indispensable character, and which had been sanctioned by the best opinions, and by a long continued and repeated practice from the very foundation of the Government.

Mr. Chairman, an incorporated national bank being out of the question for the period of Mr. Tyler's term of office; and the executive plan of an exchequer, with all its modifications, being also condemned, and equally out of the question; the inquiry is presented—and it is one of momentous interest to this great country—whether any other mode not substantially embraced either in the plan of a a national bank, or in that of a Government bank, and free from insuperable difficulties, can now be devised and adopted for the accomplishment of the same great and desirable purpose of supplying to the country a sound and uniform national currency? If such a mode can be suggested which shall be found on examination, on the one hand, to promise complete and happy success; and, on the other, to be liable to no constitutional or other sound objection,—then, for one, I shall feel that I have failed in the most solemn of all my public duties, and of all my political engagements, if I do not exert every faculty I possess in endeavoring to bring about its adoption before this Congress shall be dissolved. Sir, I believe that the plan set forth in the paper which I have sent to the Chair, will, if adopted, accomplish the important object of supplying, for the uses of both Government and people, a safe and uniform national currency; that it has in it nothing in common either with a national or a Government bank; and that it will be found on examination to be free from all serious difficulties or objections.

It is proposed, in the plan which I present, to employ a limited amount of State bank currency, adopted by this Government in such a manner as to give it the "odor of nationality"—and thus in a way which cannot subject this Government to the slightest hazard of loss. The Government, it will be recollected, is at present, and must be for some time to come, a debtor for borrowed money. Besides a permanent loan, (a part of which will become payable in a couple of years,) there are now outstanding eleven and a half or twelve millions of treasury notes, the greater part of which is now due and payable, and the residue soon will be, and the whole of which ought promptly to be taken up and cancelled. It is this necessity of the Government, by which it is compelled to become or continue a debtor for borrowed money, which enables us to devise a plan for nationalizing a limited amount of State bank currency, through a convenient money transaction with these banks. A very large proportion of all our outstanding treasury notes are understood to be in the hands of the banks; and, so far as these are concerned, to borrow money now on contracts of loan of the banks, will only be to change the form of our indebtedness to them. Besides our indebtedness on treasury notes, on mere due-bills—which ought to be paid, and which it is discreditable to us not to pay promptly at maturity—it is doubted, in some quarters, whether the means at the command of the treasury will, without further aid, carry the Government safely through to the 1st of January next. The Secretary thinks he shall have a small balance, if the sum of the appropriations shall not exceed his estimates; and it is now almost certain that the appropriations will not exceed, but will fall considerably below, his estimates. But there is still danger (as some contend) that the revenue, both from customs and lands, may fall off for the present year even further than he has yet anticipated. Now, the ability of the treasury to meet all engagements till the 1st of January next ought to be put beyond all contingency before this Congress is concluded. Every possible excuse to the Administration for calling an extra session should be taken away. A duty imposed on teas and on coffee—the most productive and the least burdensome of all our sources of revenue—would make everything safe; but parties do not like to take the responsibility. I am very sorry for it. I am always pained and afflicted when I see my political friends and associates on this floor shrinking from any duty which patriotism demands of them to perform. But it is clear that our revenue for the current year is not to be strengthened in this way. We shall adjourn without any duties on teas and coffee; and hence it becomes a matter of sound policy to provide, if we can, in some other way, for the possible contingency of a deficit in the treasury for the current year. This necessity will be found to be completely met by the plan which I have brought forward, which provides at once for the pressing pecuniary wants of the treasury, as well as for a sound and safe medium of payments and receipts both for the Government and the people.

Mr. Chairman, the plan which I propose is this: Let the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to borrow, of sound specie-paying State banks, a sum not exceeding fifteen millions of dollars—borrowing, however, of no bank an amount exceeding one-fourth part of its capital in actual possession; and the rate of interest to be paid must not exceed six per cent. He must receive of the banks effective money—gold and silver, or its equivalent, according to existing laws in regard to the medium of payments to the treasury. Let the Secretary also be authorized, on the receipt of the money borrowed, to cause an amount of the circulating notes of each lending bank, just equal to the sum borrowed of each, to be stamped on the face of such notes, "receivable in payment of public dues, according to act of Congress," and countersigned by a proper officer of the Treasury Department. Let the Secretary be authorized and required to enter into a written contract with each loaning bank, setting forth with particularity the terms and conditions of the loan, and the obligations of the respective parties; and let it be stipulated, in a special manner, that if, at any time, the bank shall suspend specie payments, or fail to redeem any of its circulating notes in gold and silver on demand at its counter, then, and from that time, interest on the loan to the Government shall cease to accrue and be payable, and the notes of the bank stamped at the treasury shall, as fast as they shall be received in payment of public dues, be cancelled, and returned to the bank in payment of the debt due from the Government to such bank. Let it also be stipulated in such contract, that the Government may, at any time, on reasonable notice, pay off or reduce its indebtedness to the bank; and also that the bank may, on reasonable notice, require the payment or reduction of its debt—the stamped notes of such bank being, in either case, cancelled to an amount equal to the payment or reduction; and, in case of a demand of payment by the bank, the Government to have the option of payment in cash, or of giving its bond for a term of years, upon interest not exceeding six per cent.

This, sir, is the general outline of the plan. It is perfectly simple; can be comprehended by a child; admits of no mystification. It means, and can mean, nothing more and nothing less than what is expressed on its face. If it is objectionable and inadmissible, gentlemen can state how and why, and they can do it as well to-day as they could after a week's reflection. It is not a plan to be thrust aside because it cannot be understood, nor because it proposes any experiment the operation of which may not be fully foreseen. It proposes no mere experiment in anything, and scarcely anything which is really new and untried. It is nothing new for this Government to borrow money, and to borrow of banks; and, though the act of stamping State bank currency receivable for public dues has not been heretofore attempted, yet banks have issued their notes before, and Government too has issued its notes. No new kind of currency is to be tried; it is the currency of State banks, limited in amount, that is proposed to be employed, resting on the same responsibility of the banks to redeem, and on the same specie basis for its convertibility, as heretofore; and the Government, instead of issuing notes of its own, on which it should stand solely responsible, will merely stamp this limited amount of State bank paper, so as to make it a legal medium of payments to the treasury by the debtors of the Government; and that by such an arrangement, that the Government cannot be subjected to the possible loss of a dollar. It is not to be Government paper in any sense; the Government is not to undertake for its redemption, or even for any default of the banks, other than by making it receivable at par for public dues as money, whether the banks redeem or fail to redeem. This, of course, is a valuable security to the holders of these bills, beyond the responsibility of the sources of issue; for it is clear, supposing suspension by any bank, or even the most complete failure and insolvency of such bank, the holders of its stamped paper could suffer no considerable loss, inasmuch as its value could never fall below that of treasury notes receivable at the treasury. The Government, in the mean time, undertaking for nothing but receivability, stands without the slightest liability to loss; since it already has the money of the bank in its hands, to the full amount of the stamped paper outstanding, for which it is indebted to the bank, and which indebtedness is reduced and paid off as fast as the stamped paper is received at the treasury, cancelled, and returned to the bank.

It is not doubted that the banks would gladly embrace the proposal held out to them by this bill. Their condition at the present time is a crippled one, just in proportion to the depressed and stagnant state of business in the country—crippled, I mean, in regard to the extent and profitableness of their current transactions. Their numbers have been much thinned by the prevailing distempers of recent times. Some of those that remain are undoubtedly still in a critical, if not desperate state; but by far the greater number never were in a sounder condition. Specie payments have been resumed all over the United States, except, I think, at two or three points only at the South. It is probable, indeed, that never before, since banking commenced in this country, did the specie in the vaults of the banks bear so large a proportion to their circulation. In the city of New York, as shown by recent returns, the banks have seven millions of specie to one million of actual circulation; and, taking all the banks of the State together, the excess of specie over their paper in the hands of the people is above a million and a quarter.

But banks may be in a very sound condition, and yet not be in a condition which favors or indicates a state of prosperity in the commercial community. At present, their circulation is greatly restricted; and yet, no doubt, the currency is as full as the real demands of business require in its present depression and stagnation; and I hope that hereafter, forever, their circulation will continue to be limited to the real demands of business, though I hope also that the time is not distant when, by better facilities, confidence will revive, and business along with it. Nothing can tend to furnish these necessary facilities so effectually as a national currency. At present, too, these banks—very many of them, certainly—are in want of good customers for their money, and can be in no way reluctant, therefore, to supply the Government with the moderate sum it requires. Indeed, the Government is already their debtor to a large amount in treasury notes, and the loan proposed by this bill will only change the form of the indebtedness. The advantage to the banks in this transaction is obvious. It secures to them not only a good customer for a portion of their loanable capital, but also the pretty certain benefit of a circulation to an amount equal to the loan. If they can keep out any paper whatever, they can certainly keep out this stamped paper. Much of it will travel far beyond the range of their ordinary issues, on errands which will only be accomplished, oftentimes, by running the whole circuit of commerce from one end of the country to the other. With this advantage, drawing interest as they will in their circulation, they can afford to put down the interest on their loans to a very moderate rate. And this I have no doubt would be done, and so as to effect an important saving in the item of interest, by the diminished rate, as compared with that which the Government now pays to the banks and others on its treasury notes and public debt.

But it is in no respect with any special view to the benefit of banks that this plan is brought forward; least of all, to bring them under the patronage or the pettings of the Executive. If incidental advantages accrue to them in any proper financial measure of this Government, I am not one to make that matter of difficulty or objection. I should rejoice to see this Government and the banking institutions of the country, which exist, and must exist, brought once more into harmony, after the ruthless war that has been waged upon them; but I do not want to see them brought again into a corrupt subjection to the Executive, and I cannot discover any such dangerous tendencies in the plan here proposed. Under this plan, the Government will make proposals for a business arrangement with the banks in the way of a loan, just as any other customer might do. There will be no lack of sound specie-paying banks to offer for the loan, and the Government will be forced to take the offers that are most advantageous to the Government. In all this, there is no chance for any such favoritism or corrupt practice, as when the treasury, having a surplus of very many millions of revenue on hand, was at liberty to select a few favored institutions, without limitation or restriction on its choice, as the recipients of its high bounty, in the shape of deposites, amounting to a gratuitous loan of heavy sums of money from the public coffers.

The Government, as I have said, is, and must for some time continue to be, a debtor for borrowed money. The plan now proposed does not contemplate any increase of the public debt—none, certainly, of any consequence. Fifteen millions is named as the maximum amount to be borrowed of the banks. Twelve millions, or thereabouts, will be required within the year, to pay treasury notes actually due; and no more is allowed by the bill to be borrowed than may be found indispensable for this purpose, and to meet any actual deficit (certainly, in my opinion, not likely to occur) in the treasury in the recess of Congress. The President seems to think there is danger of a deficit; the Secretary does not, and the Committee of Ways and Means do not. This bill will, at any rate, put this matter so beyond the reach of contingency, as to leave no apology, on this score, for an extra session of Congress. This will be one point gained, but not the most important.

The stamped currency will be a perfectly safe as well as a convenient medium of payments and receipts at the treasury. No failure of the banks can affect its value in the hands of the Government. If such an event occurs, while this paper or any part of it is in its hands, it is still worth its amount in gold and silver—every dollar of it; for it will pay debts due from the Government, as well as so much gold and silver. All this kind of paper, whether in the treasury when failures occur, (if they should occur at all,) or coming in afterwards, will be equal to specie for the uses of the Government, because it will be immediately turned back to the sources from which it issued, in payment of the public debt in those quarters.

There is one possible hazard to which the treasury might in one event be subjected, but which is easily provided for beforehand. If, at any time while this plan should be in operation, one of those revulsions in the commercial world should occur, which should drive the banking institutions of the country to a general suspension of specie payments—an event which has twice happened, and only twice, in our history—then the treasury might find itself in the receipt of a medium for current revenues, which it could not pay out for current expenses. Just having passed through one of those scenes and seasons of general suspension, every one will see how little is to be apprehended at present on this score; and yet I have thought it prudent to provide for such a possible occurrence, by inserting in my bill a provisional authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to meet any such event and exigency which should arise in the recess of Congress, by an issue of treasury notes not exceeding five millions of dollars. Such would be a proper occasion for a resort to treasury notes; and this provisional authority gives every possible security to the treasury in the practical working of the plan.

But, Mr. Chairman, it is mainly to the advantage of the community, of the American people, that I have looked in bringing forward this measure. Suffering as this people have done now for long years, under the oppressive action or the cruel neglect of this Government in regard to the vital subject of the currency, it is time not only that something were attempted, but that something should be done. Admit that the attempts already made, and which have so signally failed of success, have put an end to every hope of establishing any permanent measure for fiscal purposes and for currency, any measure worthy of the subject, worthy of statesmen to devise, worthy of the country, and likely to stand the test of all trial and of all time—admit all this, and what then? Are we, therefore, justified in doing nothing?

If there be an expedient—a provisional measure like this which I have brought to the notice of the House this morning, involving no intricate details, nothing to perplex, nothing to raise apprehensions, nothing to doubt about, and nothing which can be tortured into a departure from our own well-established political and economical principles and views of public policy—a measure standing, in no way or degree, as an obstruction or impediment to our bringing out and establishing hereafter a favorite, a more worthy and permanent measure, applicable to the same subject, whenever (if ever) we may be clothed with the requisite political power—and, finally, a measure which fairly promises to be successful, to accomplish eminent good without the slightest hazard of doing any harm whatever,—if, I say, there be such a provisional measure, and if this which I here offer be such a measure, (and I religiously believe it is,) what excuse or apology can we offer to the country for failing to resort to it and to adopt it? I address myself to men of my own political faith and party. Do we wish for the confidence of the country, and for future political successes and triumphs? Let our first wish and resolution be to deserve that confidence and those successes and triumphs. We cannot command the confidence of the country by sullen inaction or a dogged resolution to do nothing, while everything valuable and effective, and not positively mischievous, remains to be done; we cannot command that confidence otherwise than by steady, persevering, and zealous efforts for the relief of the people in a season of unprecedented depression and distress, and for their prosperity. The necessary means and instruments of public prosperity, the necessary facilities for the re-establishment of the ordinary business relations and the transaction of the ordinary business operations of this great American community, cannot be supplied but through the agency of this Government. Without its action, there can be no national currency; and without such a currency, there can be no stable system of cheap and equal exchanges; and there can be no return to profitable business and to prosperity without such a currency and such exchanges. We cannot have a bank, and we will not have an exchequer; but we may have, for the current time, a national currency and equal exchanges, without either of those establishments; and, in my solemn conviction, we are much to blame if we do not now make the necessary provision on the subject.

I do not entertain a doubt that the paper contemplated by this bill will form a currency of national import and character—how perfect or complete it may be in this respect, I do not undertake to say. That it will answer, however, for the uses of travel between different and distant States, for remittance; and thus serve, to a valuable extent, for exchange, I have no manner of doubt. A New York or Boston bank note, receivable at the treasury for public dues by virtue of the treasury stamp upon it, will be equal to gold and silver at New Orleans, at St. Louis, or at Cincinnati; and the like notes of banks issued at either of these latter places would be of equal value at New York or Boston. These notes will have the essential "odor of nationality," and will fairly answer the direct uses of a national currency from the moment of their issue.

And their influence on the local currencies, it seems to me, cannot fail to be the most beneficial and salutary. When the local institutions now fail to furnish a sound convertible local currency, it may be expected that they will return—at least that some banks among them will do so—to sound practices in banking, in order to embrace the advantages which the Government will offer them, by proposing to become their customer for a portion of their loanable capital, and to help them, by its name and credit, to the benefits of a healthy circulation. Where the local currencies are now sound, but the circulation is restricted and straitened by the prevalent want of confidence between the banks and the community, the effects of the new currency—enlarging in some degree, as it probably would, the volume of the whole circulating medium—would be to invigorate and quicken the languid flow of that which already exists. It would be impossible to infuse ten or twelve millions of good convertible national currency, of equal value everywhere, and commanding equal and universal confidence, into the mass of the general currency, without producing at once a striking and marked effect on the whole material of the circulation. Some of the present paper—the most worthless portions of it—would be displaced; and all that remained to take its chance alongside of the new paper must be improved. It must put on a character fit to appear in public with that better sort of paper whose company it keeps.

This will be especially true of the unstamped paper of those banks, a portion of whose issues have the countersignature of the treasury upon them. The paper of such banks cannot fail to command the special confidence and respect of the community. The community will see that, by the very terms of the arrangement of the Government with these banks, the strongest motives are brought to bear upon them to keep themselves in a healthy and sound condition. If they fail for one instant to redeem any of their issues in specie on demand, they suffer the loss of interest on their loan; their stamped paper comes back upon them—not depreciated, but at par—which they are obliged to receive in payment for so much of their capital lent to the Government; they lose at once all the advantages of their position, and must fall back out of the line where they have stood, in disgrace, and probably in ruin. These banks will have every inducement to follow none but safe practices, to try no experiments, to indulge in no expansions. On this point, indeed, all banks have been taught a lesson, by their recent experience and sufferings, which they will not be likely to forget immediately. And my opinion is, most decidedly, that from this period forward, for a series of years, with the aid only of a sound national currency to begin with, and the proper action and conduct of this Government generally on the subject, we may expect, from the State banks in every quarter of the country, a better system of banking and a sounder condition of the currency than we have had for a very long period—certainly since the war of Gen. Jackson on the late Bank of the United States first commenced. I believe that the simple plan which I now propose, while it will furnish directly an available sort of paper for national and general uses, will be the means also, at once, of improving the local currencies all over the country, and bringing them up, where they are not so already, to an equal and uniform value, and to the specie standard; and I believe that nothing else is wanting to revive confidence and business all over the land, to restore public prosperity, and, at the same time, to replenish our exhausted treasury. For, let me add, I am not one of those who think that the tariff has ruined the treasury; I think the tariff a good one for the treasury, as well as for other interests; and that it will so prove itself to be, the moment the country returns to anything like fair prosperity. If, by the aid of this bill, or otherwise, the business of the country shall revive, we shall have twenty millions of revenue from this tariff in the year 1844. I venture this prediction.

Mr. Chairman, there is one topic more that I will touch, and then hasten to a conclusion. It seems to me that there is a prevalent and mischievous error abroad on the subject of the exchanges of the country, which needs to be corrected. It seems to be entertained in some eminent quarters, which makes it all the more dangerous, if it be error, as I suppose it to be.

There can be no doubt that deranged exchanges are a fatal obstacle to business between the different parts and sections of the country. The question is, how shall equal and cheap exchanges be supplied? Can it be done by means of a national bank, or a Government exchequer, authorized and required to sell cheap exchanges? No doubt of it in the world; but is such an institution or instrumentality necessary or effective for this purpose, except when the local currencies are deranged? No, no. It is the deranged condition of the local currencies, their unequal value as compared with specie, which makes the exchanges unequal and dear. But for this cause, exchange from any one commercial point in the country to any other commercial point, would never, except under very peculiar and temporary circumstances, command a price beyond the fair cost of remitting specie; generally it would fall far below that price, and private dealers, banks, and bankers would supply it in abundance. Certainly, I am of opinion that a bank of the United States, with branches, is the best and most convenient institution the country could have to supply the commercial community with exchanges. It could probably supply them more cheaply than they could possibly be supplied in any other mode. But if we are ever to have again regulated and equal local currencies in the country, (as I trust we are,) I confess I do not perceive the great advantage, in respect to exchanges, from setting up a Government bank, called an exchequer, to sell exchange to the community, as the Executive exchequer proposes to do, at a price "not exceeding the fair cost of remitting specie." I deny that at any time, even with the local currencies most deranged, the exchange of specie funds between commercial places in this country has, on the whole, exceeded the fair cost of remitting specie. It has been very different with the exchange of funds consisting of local paper, and the exchange of such paper funds for specie. If A, in New York, has money due him in Mobile, and that money has been collected in local currency, or consists of local paper, which is twenty-five per cent. below the par of specie, he or his agent must pay twenty-five per cent. to convert this money into specie, or specie funds, before he can exchange it with B, in Mobile, for his (B's) specie funds in New York. And if the Government exchequer, by its ageney, was then in Mobile to sell A's agent a draft in New York at one per cent., still it would cost A twenty-six per cent. to get the specie value of his money placed in New York. In all this there is no mystery, and there should be no mystification. Once make the local currencies sound, and give us at the same time a national currency of equal value everywhere, and there will be no difficulty about the exchanges. Why, sir, at this moment, without any national currency, but with the resumption of specie payments by the banks in the various quarters of the Union, the exchanges at New York are down to the most moderate rates—to one-eighth of one per cent. in many cases: scarcely anywhere exceeding two per cent., except on Mississippi, where the bank paper is irredeemable, and at a heavy discount. There is, of course, little demand for exchange where there is no business. With the introduction now of a currency of national import and equal value—which I believe the measure I present would afford—supplying the means of remitting small, or comparatively moderate sums, furnishing of itself, to some extent, a sound local currency, and acting favorably on the mass of the local currencies, there would be nothing to apprehend, and nothing to want in regard to the exchanges. They would be cheap, and they would be abundant, just in proportion to the business operations and the trade of the country, and to the demand for them; and I believe the business and trade of the country, and its common prosperity, would immediately revive under the operation of this measure. Let it be tried, and we shall see. It is at least innocuous—it can do no harm, if it should do no good.

I have already said, I think, that I regard this, at present, as a provisional measure. The very foundation on which the plan rests, in its present form, is temporary—it rests on a loan of money from the banks. Whenever the treasury shall be in a condition to pay off this loan, and it shall be deemed necessary and advisable to pay it off, there will then be nothing left for the measure, as a currency measure, to stand upon. Unless, therefore, the practical working of the plan should chance to exhibit advantages which the country would be unwilling to forego, merely to avoid the trifling expense at which it might have to be maintained, it must, in due time, give place to some wiser and more permanent measure. Nor need the country nor parties wait even for such an event for its displacement. Either party, or any party in power in the next Congress, or under the next Administration, may bring in its favorite plan, and substitute it for this. If those who shall be in power shall prefer a sub-treasury, they can have it; if a national bank, they can have it; if an exchequer, they can have it. One thing, at least, seems certain—and that is, that the party holding the majority in the present Congress must act now on the subject of the currency, or not at all for more than two years to come. Our term of office and our power are just ready to expire; and we shall be succeeded in our places and in our authority in this hall by men of very different views of public policy from our own. We have no right, if we can possibly avoid it, to leave it to the so-called Democratic party—destructives, as we hold them to be, on this, as on some other topics—to legislate for this great country in regard to the vital question of the currency. At least, let us, before we separate, adopt a measure—though not the best, which we know is impossible—yet one which cannot fail to set the country forward on the right track, and in the high road to prosperity, so that the party which is to supplant us here in the next Congress, if they shall then venture on their destructive measures, shall not have this excuse for their conduct—that they found the whole field of operation waste and derelict, and that they were bound to reclaim and re-enter upon it after their own wonted manner. We have now an opportunity of acting on this subject in a way which cannot fail to result in some benefit to the country, and so as to make our opponents pause before they shall lay their hands on our work to destroy it. Perhaps in this way they may be wholly deterred from their destructive policy. Who can tell? If not, we shall have done our duty. But how can we justify inaction? We have ourselves, by our own acts of repeal, thrown open a broad highway to the question of the currency; and do we now propose to withdraw ourselves wholly from it, and leave it free and unobstructed, for those to rush in—almost invited by ourselves to enter—whom we lately struggled so desperately to dispossess and expel from this very position? Strange conduct this, it seems to me; and such as we shall find it difficult to stand upon before those to whom we must render up our account.

But, Mr. Chairman, I take leave of the subject. I have spoken, some may think, as if I expected to succeed. No, sir; no. I have only spoken as if the measure I present deserved to succeed. I indulge in no vain expectations about it. I understand perfectly the difficulties it has to encounter in this body; and, having acquitted myself fully of my duty in regard to the whole subject, I leave the measure to its fate.

SPEECH OF MR. CUSHING,

OF MASSACHUSETTS.

In the House of Representatives, Feb, 28, 1843—On the Ashburton treaty.

Mr. CUSHING, in addition to the remarks made by him on the 28th of February, in support of the bill for carrying into effect the Ashburton treaty, as reported in the National Intelligencer of the 1st of March, intended (if time had permitted) to submit to the House the following general view of the bill under consideration:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs found, on inspection of the treaty, that, in order to give full effect thereto, legislation by Congress was necessary on the following points, viz:

1. The organization and compensation of a commission to run, trace, and mark certain parts of the boundary line between the United States and the British possessions in North America, as fixed and prescribed by the said treaty.

2. To make appropriation of, and provide for drawing from the treasury, certain sums of money required by the said treaty to be paid to the States of Maine and Massachusetts.

The committee were also of opinion that it was proper to insert in the bill a provision to authorize the application of a part of the regular naval appropriation to the preparation, equipment, and maintenance on the coast of Africa of a sufficient squadron, in order to the execution of the laws of the United States for the suppression of the slave-trade.

This treaty having been duly negotiated under authority of the Executive, and ratified by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, now constitutes an integral part of the supreme law of the land, in the express terms of the Constitution; in consideration of which the committee would, without other investigation of the subject, have deemed it their duty to present to the House, as they had done, a bill covering those points of the treaty which call for action on the part of Congress.

Mr. C. desired for himself, as this question had been very voluminously discussed elsewhere, to lay before the House only a brief analysis of those particular provisions and objects of the treaty which call for present legislation, and of the reasons of public right and policy on which such of its several stipulations are founded.

The treaty has three great objects, viz: 1. To settle and define the boundaries between the territories of the United States and those of Great Britain in North America. 2. For the final suppression of the African slave-trade; and, 3d. For the reciprocal extradition in certain cases of criminals fugitive from justice.

1. To settle and define boundaries.

In the treaty concluded at Paris on the 3d of September, 1783, by which Great Britain recognises the independence and the existing territorial rights and possessions of the United States, the boundary between the United States and the British possessions in North America on the north and east is described in the words following:

"Article 2. And that all disputes which might arise in future, on the subject of the boundaries of the said United States, may be prevented, it is hereby agreed and declared that the following are, and shall be, their boundaries, viz: From the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, viz: that angle which is formed by a line drawn due north from the source of the Saint Croix river to the highlands which divide those rivers that empty themselves into the St. Lawrence from those which fall into the Atlantic ocean, to the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river; thence down along the middle of that river to the forty-fifth degree of north latitude; from thence, by a line due west on said latitude, until it strikes the river Iroquois or Cataraguy; thence along the middle of said river into Lake Ontario, through the middle of said lake until it strikes the communication by water between that lake and Lake Erie; thence along the middle of said communication into Lake Erie, through the middle of said lake, until it arrives at the water communication between that lake and Lake Huron; thence along the middle of said water communication into Lake Huron; thence through the middle of said lake to the water communication between that lake and Lake Superior, northward to the Isles Royal and Philippeaux, to the Long Lake; thence through the middle of the said Long Lake, and the water communication between it and the Lake of the Woods, to the said Lake of the Woods; thence through the said lake to the most northwestern point thereof; and from thence, on a due-west course, to the river Mississippi, until it shall intersect the northernmost part of the thirty-first degree of north latitude. South by a line to be drawn due east from the determination of the line last mentioned, in the latitude of thirty-one degrees north of the equator, to the middle of the river Apalachicola or Catahouche; thence along the middle thereof to its junction with the Flint river; thence straight to the head of St. Mary's river; and thence down along the middle of St. Mary's river to the Atlantic ocean. East by a line to be drawn along the middle of the river St. Croix, from its mouth, in the Bay of Fundy, to its source; and from its source, directly north, to the aforesaid highlands, which divide the rivers that fall into the Atlantic ocean from those which fall into the river St. Lawrence: comprehending all islands within twenty leagues of any part of the shores of the United States, and lying between lines to be drawn due east from the points where the aforesaid boundaries between Nova Scotia on the one part, and East Florida on the other, shall respectively touch the Bay of Fundy and the Atlantic ocean; excepting such islands as now are, or heretofore have been, within the limits of the said province of Nova Scotia."

Much of the line thus described running through regions of country the geography of which was very imperfectly known at that time, controversies soon sprang up between the two Governments as to the exact locality of various sections of the described line; which controversies, though some of them were adjusted from time to time, yet continued to exist in part until they were all terminated by the negotiation of the present treaty.

A question arose in the beginning as to what river was intended by the name St. Croix, constituting the commencement of the boundary line on the Atlantic coast—there being three several rivers which were known, or claimed by one or the other party, to have been intended by the designation of St. Croix. This controversy was settled by joint commissioners appointed under the 5th article of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, concluded at London on the 19th of November, 1794, who fixed upon the Schodiac as the true St. Croix of the treaty of 1783, and thus verified and established the line from the mouth of that river to its source.

A question arose next as to the line beginning at the source of the St. Croix, as above ascertained, and from thence to where the boundary strikes the river Iroquois. For the settlement of this, a convention was concluded between the two Governments in 1803, referring to arbitration this among other parts of the line, which received the unanimous assent of the Senate, with the exception of its 5th article relating to the line between the Lake of the Woods and the Mississippi; in consequence of which, the convention failed to go into operation; and this, with other questions, remained open, to become one of the subjects of discussion at Ghent.

By the treaty concluded at Ghent on the 24th of December, 1814, provision was at length made for the adjustment of all the questions of boundary between the two Governments on the line, beginning at the source of the St. Croix, and from thence to the most northwestern point of the Lake of the Woods.

This line was divided into three sections, which were respectively referred to joint commissioners to adjust; and, if they could not agree, then the question in each case was to be submitted to the arbitration of some friendly Sovereign or State.

1. Provision was made, under the 5th article, for the section beginning at the source of the St. Croix and ending at the river Iroquois.

2. Provision was made, under the 6th article, for the section beginning at the latter point and ending at the water communication between Lake Huron and Lake Superior.

3. Provision was made, under the 7th article, for the section beginning at the water communication between Lake Huron and Lake Superior, and thence to the western extremity of the Lake of the Woods.

Meanwhile, the United States having, by the treaty with the French Republic of the 30th of April, 1803, acquired possession of Louisiana, it became necessary to adjust the boundary line between the possessions of the two Governments west of the Mississippi; in doing which, correction was made for that part of the line of the treaty of Paris between the most northwestern point of the Lake of the Woods and the river Mississippi, which part of the line had been erroneously described in that treaty, under the false supposition that, if drawn due west from the Lake of the Woods, it would strike the Mississippi. These lines were in part fixed by the stipulations of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, concluded at London on the 20th of October, 1818, which provide that, for the boundary from the most northwestern point of the Lake of the Woods, a straight line shall be drawn to intersect at right angles the forty-ninth parallel of latitude, proceeding thence to the Stony Mountains; the adjustment of the respective rights of the two Governments west of the Stony Mountains being reserved for future negotiations.

Of the several sections of boundary intended to be arranged under the provisions of the treaty of Ghent, by commissioners or by arbitration, one part only was in fact adjusted, viz: from where the forty-fifth parallel of latitude intersects the Iroquois to the foot of the Neebish rapids, between Lake Huron and Lake Superior. Upon the other parts of the boundary—that is to say, on the one hand, the long line from the source of the St. Croix to the river Iroquois, constituting the northern boundary of the States of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, and part of New York; and, on the other hand, from a point between Lake Huron and Lake Superior, to the northwestern extremity of the Lake of the Woods, constituting, in part, the boundary of the State of Michigan—the commissioners did not agree.

In conformity with the stipulations of the 5th article of the treaty of Ghent, the two Governments, by the treaty of the 29th September, 1827, submitted one of these two unadjusted lines to the arbitration of the King of the Netherlands; whose award, made in 1831, not having been accepted by the United States, that portion of the boundary has continued to be in litigation between the two Governments, perpetually disturbing their harmony, and subjecting them continually to the imminent danger of war. The treaty of Washington concludes all the questions of boundary between Great Britain and the United States, which arose originally upon the terms of the treaty of Paris, and for the adjustment of which the provisions made by the treaty of Ghent had, as yet, remained without full effect.

It does not appear that, prior to the late negotiations, any discussion occurred between the two Governments in regard to the unadjusted Northeastern boundary line—that, namely, from between Lake Huron and Lake Superior, to the most northwestern point of the Lake of the Woods; which, therefore, the less requires particular notice, it being sufficient to say that it is believed to have been settled in a manner honorable to the United States.

In regard to the controverted Northeastern boundary line, the two Houses of Congress have heretofore expressed their unanimous opinion in conformity with the convictions of the people of the United States at large, and in which I fully concur: that, according to the true construction of the terms of the treaty of Paris, the whole of the disputed territory did not belong to the United States.

At the same time, it is due in candor to both Governments, to consider whether the position of the controversy was such that the honor of the United States required, and their interests admitted, a resort to war as the only means of terminating the controversy; or whether, on the other hand, it might not be terminated honorably without war, and, if so, upon what terms and conditions.

In the first place, it must be observed that the successive admissions or acts of the United States, in the different stages of the controversy, have been such as to discountenance the idea of war upon the mere point of title, unless by incidents occurring in the controversy, or by the absence of any other alternative that should be rendered necessary to vindicate the honor or maintain the interest of the United States.

Mr. Jefferson, in whose Presidency the treaty of 1803 for the settlement of this question was negotiated, expressed at that time the following opinion upon the subject:

"A further knowledge of the ground in the northeastern and northwestern angles of the United States has evinced that the boundaries established by the treaty of Paris, between the British territories and ours in those parts, were too imperfectly described to be susceptible of execution. It has, therefore, been thought worthy of attention, for preserving and cherishing the harmony and useful intercourse subsisting between the two nations, to remove, by timely arrangements, what unfavorable incidents might otherwise render a ground of future misunderstanding. A convention has, therefore, been entered into, which provides for a practicable demarcation of those limits to the satisfaction of both parties."

Mr. Madison, the then Secretary of State, not only entertained the same views, but also on that account recommended the adoption of a new conventional line, as follows:

"In fixing," said he, "the point at which the line is to terminate, and which is referred to as the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, the difficulty arises from a reference of the treaty of 1783 to 'the highlands,' which it is now found have no definite existence. To remove this difficulty, no better expedient occurs than to provide for the appointment of a third commissioner, as in article 5 of the treaty of 1794; and to authorize the three to determine on a point to be substituted for the description in the second article of the treaty of 1783, having due regard to the general idea that the line ought to terminate on the elevated ground dividing the rivers falling into the Atlantic from those emptying themselves into the St. Lawrence. The commissioners may also be authorized to substitute for the description of the boundary between the point so fixed and the northwesternmost head of the Connecticut river, namely, a line 'along the said highlands;' such a reference to intermediate sources of rivers, or other ascertained or ascertainable points, to be connected by straight lines, as will admit of easy and accurate execution hereafter, and as will best comport with the apparent intention of the treaty of 1783."

Mr. Monroe and Mr. Adams, each either in the Cabinet or in the Presidency, sanctioned an original act of arbitration in preference to war.

General Jackson was in favor of acceding to the award of the King of the Netherlands; and afterwards authorized a proposition of construction, which was equivalent to a new conventional line, and also a proposition of mutual arrangement by equivalents.

Mr. Van Buren had entered into negotiations with Great Britain for settling the question by recurrence to a second arbitration, which negotiations were pending when the present Administration came into power. Upon which there remained for the Government of the United States only the following alternative courses among which to choose, namely:

1. War.

2. Absolute inaction: the neglect or indefinite postponement of the question.

3. A new arbitration.

4. Negotiation with a view to the conventional arrangement of the question by mutual concessions, and by means of equivalents, saving the honor and interests of both Governments.

If there had been no other and higher consideration to forbid immediate recourse to war on this question, it would have been precluded by the arrival in the United States of a special minister, sent hither by Great Britain for the express purpose of endeavoring to arrange the question in an amicable spirit; and the same fact rendered it impossible for the Government to abstain from or evade action upon the subject. And the Government was, of course, compelled to consider and decide whether it would proceed to complete the negotiation for a second arbitration, as begun by Mr. Van Buren; or whether it would enter into a treaty for a new conventional line satisfactory to both Governments.

In deciding which of these two courses to adopt, and what should be the conditions and equivalents of a new treaty, it became necessary to consider not only the general interests of the United States, but also the particular interests of the States of Maine and Massachusetts; since it was the territory of one, and the property of both, which constituted the chief subject of dispute. And accordingly, though the Constitution confers on the Union alone the exclusive power of treaty, yet, recognising the right of Maine and Massachusetts to be heard in the matter, the Federal Government incited them to appoint commissioners respectively to repair to this city, and confer with the authorities of this Government concerning a line by agreement or compromise, with its equivalents and compensation; which invitation was complied with by those States.

The commissioners of those two States, in common with the authorities of the Federal Government, were of opinion that negotiation for a new conventional line by equivalents was preferable to a second arbitration—not only because of the delay attending the latter course, but because of the probability that it might, in its result, be less advantageous to the United States.

Under these circumstances was the present treaty concluded, establishing a new conventional line, with the assent of Maine and Massachusetts, who, for the cession of a part of the soil of Maine, the property of both States, receive, besides the great boon of peace, compensations and equivalents in money, and the privilege of the navigation of the river St. John. Any question in regard to the rights and interests of those two States is of course concluded by their previous assent to the treaty; and it only remains to consider how the treaty in this part of it affects the rights of other States and of the Union.

In regard to the individual interests of the other States immediately affected—namely, New Hampshire, Vermont, and New York—there is no room for controversy; since the treaty adopts, from among the disputed lines, the one most favorable for New Hampshire, and obtains from Great Britain the relinquishment of a considerable tract of territory along the frontier of Vermont and New York, heretofore supposed to belong to those States; but which recent examinations had shown to belong of right to Great Britain; in which cession is included the all-important acquisition of the military position of Rouse's Point.

As a question of the rights and interests of the United States, the foregoing considerations, and the ratification of the treaty by the Senate, who were the constitutional judges on that point, would seem to be conclusive of the subject.

It has been objected, however, that the treaty involves concession to Great Britain—that is to say, the relinquishment of the territory belonging to Maine, and, through Maine, to the United States. But no amicable arrangement, it is obvious, of any long-controverted question of mutual rights, can ever be concluded between two powerful and proud nations, without concessions on one or the other side, or on both sides. In this case, there has been reciprocity of concession; and the States directly interested have, by their commissioners, declared in effect that those reciprocal concessions are founded on adequate equivalents and compensations. Of course, under such circumstances, it has been rightly judged by the Senate that the concession made on our side does not prejudice the honor of the United States.

Specific objections have been made to the particular concessions themselves, more especially because of the relinquishment to Great Britain of the small tract of desert land at the head-waters of the St. Francis, which, it has been argued, places an important military position in the hands of Great Britain. This idea is distinctly met by the commissioners of the State of Maine, in their report to their Government; who pronounce that this narrow belt of land is of "comparatively little value;" and who add: "To Great Britain, nearly its whole value will consist in securing to her a broad inhospitable wilderness frontier. Such a frontier in that quarter is not undesirable even to Maine. Its possession to Maine would be of little value, and is more a matter of pride than interest." And there is the amplest possible evidence, in the opinion of the best informed military men, that, for the purposes of military position, the tract in question is wholly valueless to both countries; and, by interposing a desert barrier between them, is as convenient to one as to the other.

Finally: it has been objected that the treaty leaves unadjusted the great controversy as to the country west of the Rocky Mountains. But that is not so much a question of boundary as it is of vast territorial rights. Nor is it any valid cause to condemn a treaty which settles many questions, that it leaves one unsettled. It is the same fact which has repeatedly occurred before in our negotiations with England; and the United States run no risk of loss, but the contrary, so far as regards Oregon, by the attention of the Federal Government being undividedly fixed on that important region.

On the whole, therefore, when it is seen that, by these arrangements, the immense interests of all the Northern frontier of the United States, from the Atlantic sea to the Lake of the Woods, are amicably settled; that, of the disputed territory in Maine, the largest part in quantity, and far the largest in value, is retained by us; that no cession is made to Great Britain, without equivalent concession to the United States; that, among the latter concessions, are several valuable acquisitions of territory made by us in the North and Northwest; that sundry minor questions of border interests are at the same time satisfactorily disposed of; that, in a military point of view, we have secured to ourselves one of the most important positions, if not the most important, on the whole frontier; and that, in fine, firm stability is now given to the peaceful relations of Great Britain and the United States;—it must be considered and admitted, when all this is seen, that, so far as regards questions of boundary, in ratifying the treaty, the Senate have judged well for the honor and the interests of the United States.

II. The suppression of the African slave-trade.

The Government of the United States has, from the beginning, manifested an earnest and persevering solicitude to put an end to the African slave-trade. This wish has appeared, in the first place, in all our legislation; the United States having been the earliest among the nations of the earth to pronounce its formal condemnation by penal laws, among which is the great and decisive act in which that trade was stigmatized with the brand of piracy. Our Government has, in the second place, pursued the same policy in its foreign negotiations; conformably with which, on concluding the treaty of Ghent, we entered into the following stipulation with Great Britain:

Art. 10. "Whereas the traffic in slaves is irreconcilable with the principles of humanity and justice; and whereas both his Majesty and the United States are desirous of continuing their efforts to promote its entire abolition, it is hereby agreed that both the contracting parties shall use their best endeavors to accomplish so desirable an object."

Meanwhile the British Government took up the idea of arrangement between the several powers of Christendom for the reciprocal concession of the right of search on the high seas, as the means of detecting and arresting vessels engaged in the slave-trade. This proposition, when first made by the British to the French Government, was rejected; but was soon afterwards agreed to by Spain and by Portugal, so far as regard d vessels found north of the equator; and, at length, by France and by most others of the principal Governments of Europe. Negotiations were also entered into between Great Britain and the United States, with a view to obtain the same concession from us; but, although at one period our Government was disposed in a limited degree to grant this, yet, owing to the well-founded jealousy entertained in the United States on the subject of the right of search in general—abused as that right had been by Great Britain, when exercised by her as a belligerent right—the contemplated arrangement on the subject did not go into operation; and the policy of the United States has at length settled down into a fixed feeling of insuperable objection to the extension of the right of search by treaty, in any manner, or to any foreign State whatever, and especially to Great Britain.

The people of the United States could not fail to remember that Great Britain had reached the fact of the impressment of seamen from on board American vessels through an abuse of the right of search. The British Government claimed and exercised the belligerent right to enter and visit our vessels in search of persons in the service of an enemy, and in search of enemy's goods or goods contraband of war; and the pretext of the British Government, as set forth in the celebrated declaration of the Prince Regent of the 9th of January, 1813, was, that although a British officer could not enter an American vessel for the express purpose of impressment, yet that, having once entered the vessel for the lawful cause of search for contraband of war or enemy's person or goods, he might then proceed to examine the crew, and impress them as British seamen. If such consequences, unlawful in themselves, and as a primary cause of entry, could be founded on the lawful exercise of the right of search, they constituted a permanent obstacle to any extension of the right of search beyond what already existed of that right under the general law of nations. However desirable it might be to extinguish the African slave-trade, and to prevent the American flag from being misused in the African seas to cover the slave-traders of other nations, it was still more important to preserve the whole commerce of the United States from the abuses and oppressions to which it might be subject under concessions of any right of search to Great Britain. These abuses had already involved the two nations in war; and, if an opening were afforded for their renewal, they could scarcely fail to terminate once again in the same disastrous conclusion.

Upon which Great Britain, while steadily pursuing the policy of negotiating with each of the European powers treaties of reciprocal search for the suppression of the slave-trade, superadded to this the enactment of an act of Parliament of the 24th of August, 1839, under which the admiralty was authorized to issue orders to British cruisers to capture all vessels engaged in the slave-trade not being justly entitled to claim the protection or flag of any state or nation, and providing that every such vessel should be subject to seizure, detention, and condemnation, if, in the equipment of such vessel, there should be found any one of certain enumerated things, described in the act of Parliament as constituting cause of suspicion, or prima facie evidence of the actual employment of the vessel in the transport of slaves. The Duke of Wellington, Lord Lyndhurst, and other distinguished personages, protested against the passage of this law; alleging that it was an attempt to interpolate the English municipal law into the law of nations; that it would violate the rights of all Europe, and especially those of Portugal and France; and that, above all, it could not fail to embroil England with the people of the United States.

Nevertheless, the act was immediately put in force against the vessels of the United States, and was in chief part the cause of the late controversy between the two Governments in regard to the seizure of American vessels by British cruisers on the coast of Africa; which controversy led to the following emphatic announcement, by the President of the United States, of the determination and policy of our Government on this subject:

"However desirous the United States may be for the suppression of the slave-trade, they cannot consent to interpolations into the maritime code, at the mere will and pleasure of other Governments. We deny the right of any such interpolation to any one or all the nations of the earth, without our consent. We claim to have a voice in all amendments or alterations of that code; and when we are given to understand, as in this instance, by a foreign Government, that its treaties with other nations cannot be executed without the establishment and enforcement of new principles of maritime police, to be applied without our consent, we must employ a language neither of equivocal import, nor susceptible of misconstruction. American citizens, prosecuting a lawful commerce in the African seas, under the flag of their country, are not responsible for the abuse or unlawful use of that flag by others; nor can they rightfully, on account of any such alleged abuses, be interrupted, molested, or detained, while on the ocean."

At the same time, it was undeniable and notorious that the American flag had been fraudulently assumed in many instances to cover the enterprises of Spanish, Portuguese, or Brazilian slave-traders. What, then, did it become the United States to do? We had asserted our own independence of Great Britain in this matter; we had maintained, so far as regarded us, the liberty of the sea; we had repelled the proposition of a reciprocal right of search; we had rejected for ourselves that general police of the ocean which Great Britain seemed disposed to arrogate. Having done this, it remained for us to vindicate the honor of our flag, and to see to the execution of our laws on the coast of Africa, by maintaining a police of our own in those seas. And the stipulation of the treaty of Ghent called upon us to do this, in concert and co-operation with Great Britain.

These considerations resulted in the adoption of the 8th and 9th articles of the present treaty, which provide for concerted cruising on the coast of Africa, to the tacit exclusion of the right of search, and for remonstrance with those powers which still tolerate the African slave-trade.

The arrangement now adopted seems to be the true and only solution of the mixed problem of duty and of honor involved in the fact that, while, on the one hand, the United States were bound by treaty, by domestic policy, and by general obligation, to prevent the prosecution of the slave-trade under our flag, we yet, on the other hand, felt ourselves compelled to refuse to England the concession of the reciprocal right of search on the ocean. And it is believed that not only is the arrangement an honorable one, so far as concerns the character of the United States, but that it has had an important influence in arresting the progress of Great Britain towards the interpolation of a new maritime assumption of hers into the law of nations, through the means of conventional intercessions, as between her and the other powers of Europe.

Mr. C. would abstain from discussing at length the remaining object of the treaty—namely, the extradition of fugitive criminals—because no present legislation is requisite in relation thereto; as, also, for the same reason, from entering at large into those parts of the correspondence which are only collateral to the treaty.

It is the well-understood principle of the law of nations, that, without conventional engagements to that effect, no State is bound to deliver up to any foreign Government strangers seeking refuge and asylum, because of crimes committed elsewhere, whatever be the nature of those crimes. Without there being a convention on the subject, each State judges for itself, as the case arises, whether it will or will not deliver up a fugitive criminal to another State requesting the same. It is generally refused in the case of political offences: it is frequently granted, either under treaty or as an act of international comity, in the case of heinous municipal offences against private property or person. Such is the rule, and such the practice, as laid down in the books of international law. The principle has been recognised frequently in the intercourse between the United States and other Governments; and is very amply discussed in two opinions given by Mr. Wirt, as Attorney General of the United States—first, in 1817, on the demand for the surrender of William Manning; and, secondly, on that of Daniel Sullivan, in 1821; each of them a fugitive from the justice of the British Government.

In the absence of any conventional arrangement on this point between Great Britain and the United States, each Government is subjected to much inconvenience, by reason of the contiguity of a portion of their territories, as well as by their identity of race and language. It is not for the interest of either country to become the common receptacle of the felons of the other. Hence the stipulation in the treaty for the reciprocal surrender of criminals fugitive from justice, in certain specified and carefully guarded cases of municipal felony—the stipulation, nevertheless, for further security, if it should prove liable to unforeseen abuse, being terminable at the will of either Government.

In the correspondence accompanying the treaty, explanations are demanded from the British Government, the rights of the United States defended, and our future policy declared and expounded, on three great questions, which have at different times interrupted the harmony of the two Governments, namely: first, the interference of the local authorities in the British colonies with slaves on board American coasting vessels, casually driven, by stress of weather or superior force, into those colonies; second, the destruction of the steamboat Caroline, at Schlosser; and, third, the impressment of American seamen by officers of the British Government on the high seas—respecting which, Mr. C. referred to the documents accompanying the President's message, as adding to the other considerations which justified the passage of the bill before the House.

Treaty between Great Britain, Austria, France, Prussia, and Russia, for the suppression of the African slave-trade.

In the name of the most holy and indivisible Trinity. Their Majesties, the Emperor of Austria, King of Hungary and Bohemia, the King of Prussia, and the Emperor of all the Russias, being desirous to give full and complete effect to the principles which have already been recorded in the solemn declarations made by Austria, Prussia, and Russia, in common with other European powers, at the Congress of Vienna, on the 8th of February, 1815, and at the Congress of Verona, on the 28th of November, 1822—declarations by which the said powers announced that they were ready to concur in everything that might secure and accelerate the complete and final abolition of the slave trade; and their Majesties having been invited by her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and by his Majesty the King of the French, to conclude a treaty for the more effectual suppression of the traffic, their said Majesties have determined to negotiate and conclude together a treaty for the final abolition of that traffic. And to this end they have named as their plenipotentiaries, that is to say:

Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, the right honorable George, Earl of Aberdeen, Viscount Gordon, Viscount Formartine, Lord Haddo, Methlick, Tarvis, and Kellie, a Peer of the United Kingdom, a member of her Majesty's most honorable Privy Council, Knight of the most ancient and most noble Order of the Thistle, and her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs;

His Majesty the Emperor of Austria, King of Hungary and Bohemia, the Sieur Augustus, Baron de Koller, Knight of the order of St. Ferdinand and of Merit of Sicily, Councillor of Embassy, his Chargé d'Affaires and Plenipotentiary in London;

His Majesty the King of the French, the Sieur Louis de Beaupoil, Count of St. Aulaire, a Peer of France, Grand Officer of the royal order of the Legion of Honor, Grand Cross of the order of Leopold of Belgium, one of the Forty of the French Academy, his Ambassador Extraordinary to her Britannic Majesty;

His Majesty the King of Prussia, the Sieur Alexander Gustavus Adolphus, Baron de Schleinitz, Knight of the royal order of St. John of Jerusalem, his Chamberlain, Councillor of Legation, Chargé d'Affaires and Plenipotentiary in London;

And his Majesty, the Emperor of all the Russias, the Sieur Philip, Baron de Brunow, Knight of the Order of the White Eagle, of St. Anne of the first class, of St. Stanislaus of the first class, of St. Waldimir of the third, Commander of the order of St. Stephen of Hungary, Knight of the Order of the Red Eagle, of St. John of Jerusalem, his Privy Counsellor, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to her Britannic Majesty:

Who, after having communicated to each other their full powers, found to be in good and due form, have agreed upon and signed the following articles:

Article 1. Their Majesties, the Emperor of Austria, King of Hungary and Bohemia, the King of Prussia, and the Emperor of all the Russias, engage to prohibit all trade in slaves, either by their respective subjects, or under their respective flags, or by means of capital belonging to their respective subjects, and to declare such traffic piracy. Their Majesties further declare that any vessel which may attempt to carry on the slave-trade shall, by that fact alone, lose all right to the protection of their flag.

Article 2. In order more completely to accomplish the object of the present treaty, the high contracting parties agree, by common consent, that those of their ships of war which shall be provided with special warrants and orders, prepared according to the forms of the annex A of the present treaty, may search every merchant vessel belonging to any one of the high contracting parties which shall, on reasonable grounds, be suspected of being engaged in the traffic in slaves, or of having been fitted out for that purpose, or of having been engaged in the traffic during the voyage in which she shall have been met with by the said cruisers; and that such cruisers may detain, and send or carry away such vessels, in order that they may be brought to trial in the manner hereafter agreed upon.

Nevertheless, the abovementioned right of searching the merchant vessels of any one or other of the high contracting parties, shall be exercised only by ships of war whose commanders shall have the rank of captain, or that of lieutenant in the royal or imperial navy, unless the command shall, by reason of death or otherwise, have devolved upon an officer of inferior rank. The commanders of such ships of war shall be furnished with warrants according to the form annexed to the present treaty, under letter A.

The said mutual right of search shall not be exercised within the Mediterranean sea. Moreover, the space within which the exercise of the said right shall be confined, shall be bounded on the north by the 32d parallel of north latitude; on the west by the eastern coast of America, from the point where the 32d parallel of north latitude strikes that coast, down to the 45th parallel of south latitude; on the south by the 45th parallel of south latitude, from the point where that parallel strikes the eastern coast of America, to the 80th degree of longitude east from the meridian of Greenwich; and on the east by the same degree of longitude, from the point where it is intersected by the 45th parallel of south latitude, up to the coast of India.

Art. 3. Each of the high contracting parties which may choose to employ cruisers for the suppression of the slave-trade, and to exercise the mutual right of search, reserves to itself to fix, according to its own convenience, the number of the ships of war which shall be employed on the service stipulated in the second article of the present treaty, as well as the stations on which the said ships shall cruise.

The names of the ships appointed for this purpose, and those of their commanders, shall be communicated by each of the high contracting parties to the others; and they shall reciprocally apprize each other every time that a cruiser shall be placed on a station, or shall be recalled from thence, in order that the necessary warrants may be delivered by the Governments authorizing the search, and returned to those Governments by the Government which has received them, when those warrants shall no longer be necessary for the execution of the present treaty.

Art. 4. Immediately after the Government which employs the cruisers shall have notified to the Government which is to authorize the search, the number and the names of the cruisers which it intends to employ, the warrants authorizing the search shall be made out according to the form annexed to the present treaty under the letter A, and shall be delivered by the Government which authorizes the search to the Government which employs the cruiser.

In no case shall the mutual right of search be exercised upon the ships of war of the high contracting parties.

The high contracting parties shall agree upon a particular signal, to be used exclusively by those cruisers which shall be invested with the right of search.

Art. 5. The cruisers of the high contracting parties authorized to exercise the right of search and detention in execution of the present treaty, shall conform themselves strictly to the instructions annexed to the said treaty under letter B, in all that relates to the formalities of the search and of the detention, as well as to the measures to be taken, in order that the vessel suspected of having been employed in the traffic may be delivered over to the competent tribunals.

The high contracting parties reserve to themselves the right of making in these instructions, by common consent, such alterations as circumstances may render necessary.

The cruisers of the high contracting parties shall mutually afford to each other assistance in all cases when it may be useful that they should act in concert.

Art. 6. Whenever a merchant vessel, sailing under the flag of one of the high contracting parties, shall have been detained by a cruiser of the other, duly authorized to that effect conformably to the provisions of the present treaty, such merchant vessel, as well as the master, the crew, the cargo, and slaves who may be on board, shall be brought into such place as the high contracting parties shall have respectively designated for that purpose; and they shall be delivered over to the authorities appointed with that view by the Government within whose possessions such place is situated, in order that proceedings may be had with respect to them before the competent tribunals, in the manner hereafter specified.

When the commander of the cruiser shall not see fit to undertake himself the bringing in and the delivering up of the detained vessel, he shall intrust that duty to an officer of the rank of lieutenant in the royal or imperial navy, or, at least, to the officer who shall at the time be the third in authority on board the detaining ship.

Art. 7. If the commander of a cruiser of one of the high contracting parties should have reason to suspect that a merchant vessel sailing under the convoy of, or in company with, a ship of war of one of the other contracting parties, has been engaged in the slave-trade, or has been fitted out for that trade, he shall make known his suspicions to the commander of the ship-of-war, who shall proceed alone to search the suspected vessel; and, in case the last mentioned commander should ascertain that the suspicion is well founded, he shall cause the vessel, as well as the master, the crew, the cargo, and the slaves who may be on board, to be taken into a port belonging to the nation of the detained vesel, to be there proceeded against before the competent tribunals in the manner hereafter directed.

Art. 8. As soon as a merchant vessel, detained and sent in for adjudication, shall arrive at the port to which she is to be carried, in conformity with annexed B to the present treaty, the commander of the cruiser which shall have detained her, or the officer appointed to bring her in, shall deliver to the authorities appointed for that purpose, a copy, signed by himself, of all the lists, declarations, and other documents specified in the instructions annexed to the present treaty under letter B; and the said authorities shall proceed, in consequence, to the search of the detained vessel and of her cargo, as also to an inspection of her crew, and of the slaves who may be on board, after having previously given notice of the time of such search and inspection to the commander of the cruiser, or to the officer who shall have brought in the vessel, in order that he, or some person whom he may appoint to represent him, may be present thereat.

A minute of these proceedings shall be drawn up in duplicate, which shall be signed by the persons who shall have taken part in, and who shall have been present at, the same; and one of these documents shall be delivered to the commander of the cruiser, or to the officer appointed by him to bring in the detained vessel.

Art. 9. Every merchant vessel of any one or other of the five nations which shall be searched and detained in virtue of the provisions of the present treaty, shall, unless proof be given to the contrary, be deemed to have been engaged in the slave-trade, or to have been fitted out for that traffic, if in the fitting, the equipment, or on board the said vessel during the voyage in which she was detained, there shall be found to have been one of the articles hereafter specified, that is to say:

First. Hatches with open gratings, instead of the close hatches which are usual in merchant vessels.

Secondly. Divisions or bulkheads, in the hold or on deck, more numerous than are necessary for vessels engaged in lawful trade.

Thirdly. Spare plank fitted for being laid down as a second or slave deck.

Fourthly. Shackles, bolts, or handcuffs.

Fifthly. A larger quantity of water, in casks or in tanks, than is requisite for the consumption of the crew of the vessel as a merchant vessel.

Sixthly. An extraordinary number of water-casks, or other vessels for holding liquid, unless the master shall produce a certificate from the custom-house, at the place from which he cleared outwards, stating that a sufficient security had been given by the owners of such vessel that such extra quantity of casks or of other vessels should only be used for the reception of oil, or for other purposes of lawful commerce.

Seventhly. A greater quantity of mess tubs or kids than are requisite for the use of the crew of the vessel as a merchant vessel.

Eighthly. A boiler or other cooking apparatus of an unusual size, and larger, or capable of being made larger, than requisite for the use of the crew of such merchant vessel; or more than one boiler or other cooking apparatus of the ordinary size.

Ninthly. An extraordinary quantity of kier, of the flour of Brazil manioc, or cassada, commonly called farina, or of maize, or of Indian corn, or of any other article of food whatever beyond the probable wants of the crew; unless such quantity of kier, farina, maize, Indian corn, or any other article of food, should be entered on the manifest as forming part of the trading cargo of the vessel.

Tenthly. A quantity of mats or matting greater than is necessary for the use of such merchant vessel, unless such mats or matting be on the manifest as forming part of the cargo.

If it is established that one or more of the said articles above specified are on board, or have been on board during the voyage in which the vessel was captured, that fact shall be considered as prima facie evidence that the vessel was employed in the traffic, she shall, in consequence, be condemned, and declared lawful prize, unless the master or the owners shall furnish clear and incontrovertible evidence, proving to the satisfaction of the tribunal that, at the time of her detention or capture, the vessel was employed in a lawful undertaking; and that such of the different articles above specified as were found on board at the time of detention, or which might have been embarked during the voyage on which she was engaged when she was captured, were indispensable for the accomplishment of the lawful object of her voyage.

Art. 10. Proceedings shall be immediately taken against the vessel detained as above stated, her master, her crew, and her cargo, before the competent tribunals of the country to which she belongs; and they shall be tried and adjudged according to the established forms and laws in force in that country; and if it results from the proceedings that the said vessel was employed in the slave-trade, or fitted out for that traffic, the vessel, her fittings, and her cargo of merchandise shall be confiscated; and the master, the crew, and their accomplices shall be dealt with conformably to the laws by which they shall have been tried.

In case of confiscation, the proceeds of the sale of the aforesaid vessel shall, within the space of six months, reckoning from the date of the sale, be placed at the disposal of the Government of the country to which the ship which made the capture belongs, in order to be employed in conformity with the laws of that country.

Art. 11. If any one of the articles specified in article 9 of the present treaty is found on board a merchant vessel, or if it is proved to have been on board of her during the voyage in which she was captured, no compensation for losses, damages, or expenses consequent upon the detention of such vessel shall in any case be granted, either to the master or to the owner, or to any other person interested in the equipment or in the lading, even though a sentence of condemnation should not have been pronounced against the vessel, as a consequence of her detention.

Art. 12. In all cases in which a vessel shall have been detained in conformity with the present treaty, as having been employed in the slave-trade, or fitted out for that traffic, and shall in consequence have been tried and confiscated, the Government of the cruiser which shall have made the capture, or the Government whose tribunal shall have condemned the vessel for the service of its royal navy, at the price fixed by a competent person selected for that purpose by the said tribunal, the Government whose cruiser shall have made the capture shall have a right of preference in the purchase of the vessel. But if the condemned vessel should not be purchased in the manner above pointed out, she shall be wholly broken up immediately after the sentence of confiscation, and sold in separate portions after having been broken up.

Art. 13. When, by the sentence of the competent tribunal, it shall have been ascertained that a merchant vessel detained in virtue of the present treaty was not engaged in the slave-trade, and was not fitted out for that traffic, she shall be restored to the lawful owner or owners. And if, in the course of the proceedings, it should have been proved that the vessel was searched and detained illegally, or without sufficient cause of suspicion, or that search or detention were attended with abuse or vexation, the commander of the cruiser, or the officer who shall have boarded the said vessel, or the officer who shall have been intrusted with bringing her in, and under whose authority, according to the nature of the case, the abuse or vexation shall have occurred, shall be liable in costs and damages to the master and the owners of the vessel and of the cargo.

These costs and damages may be awarded by the tribunal before which the proceedings against the detained vessel, her master, crew, and cargo, shall have been instituted; and the Government of the country to which the officer who shall have given occasion for such award shall belong, shall pay the amount of said costs and damages within the period of six months from the date of the sentence, when the sentence shall have been pronounced by a tribunal sitting in Europe; and within the period of one year, when the trial shall have taken place out of Europe.

Art. 14. When, in the search or detention of a merchant vessel, effected in virtue of the present treaty, any abuse or vexation shall have been committed, and when the vessel shall not have been delivered over to the jurisdiction of her own nation, the master shall make a declaration, upon oath, of the abuses or vexations of which he shall have to complain, as well as of the costs and damages to which he shall lay claim; and such declaration shall be made by him before the competent authorities of the first port of his own country at which he shall arrive, or before the consular agent of his own nation at a foreign port, if the vessel shall in the first instance touch at a foreign port where there is such an agent.

This declaration shall be verified by means of an examination, upon oath, of the principal persons amongst the crew or the passengers who shall have witnessed the search or detention; and a formal statement of the whole shall be drawn up, two copies whereof shall be delivered to the master, who shall forward one of them to his Government, in support of his claim for costs and damages.

It is understood that, if any circumstances beyond control shall prevent the master from making his declaration, it may be made by the owner of the vessel, or by any other person interested in the equipment or in the lading of the vessel.

On a copy of the formal statement above mentioned being officially transmitted to it, the Government of the country to which the officer to whom the abuses or vexations shall be imputed, shall forthwith institute an inquiry; and if the validity of the complaint shall be ascertained, that Government shall cause to be paid to the master or the owner, or to any other person interested in the equipment or lading of the molested vessel, the amount of costs and damages which shall be due to him.

Art. 15. The high contracting parties engage reciprocally to communicate to each other, when asked to do so, and without expense, copies of the proceedings instituted, and of the judgments given, relative to vessels searched or detained in the execution of the provisions of this treaty.

Art. 16. The high contracting parties agree to insure the immediate freedom of all the slaves who shall be found on board vessels detained and condemned in virtue of the stipulations of the present treaty.

Art. 17. The high contracting parties agree to invite the maritime powers of Europe which have not yet concluded treaties for the abolition of the slave-trade to accede to the present treaty.

Art. 18. The acts or instruments annexed to the present treaty, and which it is mutually agreed to consider as forming an integral part thereof, are the following:

A. Forms of warrants of authorization, and of orders for the guidance of the cruisers of each nation, in the searches and detentions to be made in virtue of the present treaty.

B. Instructions for the cruisers of the naval forces employed in virtue of the present treaty for the suppression of the slave trade.

Art. 19. The present treaty, consisting of nineteen articles, shall be ratified, and the ratifications thereof shall be exchanged at London at the expiration of two months from this date, or sooner if possible.

In witness whereof, the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the present treaty, in English and French, and have thereunto affixed the seal and their arms.

ANNEX A,

To the treaty between Great Britain, Austria, France, Prussia, and Russia, for the suppression of the African slave-trade, signed at London the 20th December, 1841.

Form 1. Warrants in virtue of which a cruiser of one of the high contracting parties to this treaty may visit and detain a merchant vessel belonging to, or bearing the flag of, another of the high contracting parties, and suspected of being engaged in the slave-trade, or of being fitted out for that traffic:

Whereas, by a treaty concluded between Great Britain, Austria, France, Prussia, and Russia, signed at London on the 20th of December, 1841, for the total suppression of the African slave-trade, it was stipulated that certain cruisers belonging to the said countries, respectively, should be instructed to visit and detain, within particular limits, merchant vessels of the other contracting parties engaged in the traffic in slaves, or suspected of being fitted out for that traffic; and whereas the Government of ——— has thought fit that the vessel you command shall be one of the ——— cruisers furnished with said special instructions, you will accordingly receive instructions from the said Government for your guidance on the said service: you are, therefore, authorized, by virtue of these instructions, and of the present warrant, to visit merchant vessels under the ——— flag, suspected of being engaged in the traffic in slaves, within the limits set forth in the second article of the said treaty, and to deal with such vessels as shall have engaged in the slave-trade, or shall be suspected of being fitted out for that traffic, as pointed out in the said treaty, and in the instructions thereunto annexed.

Given under our hands and the seal of the ———, office of ———, the ——— of ———,

To the commander of the ———.

Form 2. Orders for the guidance of the commander of the cruiser of one of the high contracting parties in visiting and detaining a merchant vessel belonging to, or bearing the flag of, another of the high contracting parties:

Whereas, by a treaty concluded between Great Britain, Austria, France, Prussia, and Russia, signed at London on the twentieth of December, 1841, for the total suppression of the African slave-trade, it was stipulated that certain cruisers belonging to the said countries, respectively, shall be authorized, under special instructions therein mentioned, to visit and detain, within particular limits, merchant vessels of the other contracting parties engaged in the slave-trade, or suspected of being fitted out for that traffic: and whereas we think fit that the vessel you command shall be one of the ——— cruisers furnished with the said special instructions, we herewith transmit to you a copy of the said treaty of the 20th of December, and of the instructions thereunto annexed, hereinbefore mentioned; and you are accordingly authorized, by virtue of this present order, and of the accompanying warrant from the Government of ———, to visit, within the limits set forth in the second article of the said treaty, merchant vessels under the ——— flag suspected of being engaged in the slave-trade, and to deal with such vessels as shall have been engaged in that traffic in the manner pointed out in said treaty, warrant, and instructions; and we charge and require you to conform most strictly to all the provisions and stipulations contained therein, taking care to exercise the authority so conferred upon you in the mildest manner, and with every attention which is due between allied and friendly nations, and to co-operate cordially with the commanders of any ——— vessels of war employed in the same service.

Given under our hands and the seal of the ———, office of ———, the ——— day of ———.

To the commander of the ———.

These forms of warrants and orders shall be annexed to the treaty signed this day between Great Britain, Austria, France, Prussia, and Russia, for the suppression of the African slave-trade, and shall be considered as an integral part of that treaty.

In witness whereof, the plenipotentiaries of the high contracting parties have signed this annex, and have thereunto affixed the seal of their arms.

Done at London, the twentieth day of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and forty-one.

ANNEX B,

To the treaty between Great Britain, Austria, France, Prussia, and Russia, for the suppression of the African slave-trade, signed at London, the 20th December, 1841.

INSTRUCTIONS TO CRUISERS.

First. Whenever a merchant vessel belonging to, or bearing the flag of, any one of the high contracting parties, shall be visited by a cruiser of any one of the other high contracting parties, the officer commanding the cruiser shall, before he proceeds to the visit, exhibit to the master of such vessel the special orders which confer upon him by exception the right to visit her; and he shall deliver to such master a certificate, signed by himself, specifying his rank in the navy of his country, and the name of the ship which he commands, and declaring that the only object of his visit is to ascertain whether the vessel is engaged in the slave-trade, or is fitted out for the purpose of such traffic, or has been engaged in that traffic during the voyage in which she has been met with by the said cruiser. When the visit is made by an officer of the cruiser other than the commander, such officer shall not be under the rank of lieutenant in the navy—unless he be the officer who, at the time, is second in command of the ship by which the visit is made; and in this case such officer shall exhibit to the master of the merchant vessel a copy of the special orders above mentioned, signed by the commander of the cruiser; and shall likewise deliver to such master a certificate, signed by himself, specifying the rank which he holds in the navy of his country, the name of the commander under whose orders he is acting, the name of the cruiser to which he belongs, and the object of his visit, as hereinbefore recited.

If it shall be ascertained by the visit that the ship's papers are regular, and her proceedings lawful, the officer shall certify upon the log-book of the vessel that the visit took place in virtue of the special orders above mentioned; and when these formalities shall have been completed, the vessel shall be permitted to continue her course.

Secondly. If, in consequence of the visit, the officer commanding the cruiser shall be of opinion that there are sufficient grounds for believing that the vessel is engaged in the slave-trade, or has been fitted out for that traffic, or has been engaged in that traffic during the voyage in which she is met by the cruiser; and if he shall, in consequence, determine to detain her, and to have her delivered up to the jurisdiction of the competent authorities, he shall forthwith cause a list to be made out, in duplicate, of all the papers found on board; and he shall sign this list and the duplicate, adding, after his own name, his rank in the navy, and the name of the vessel under his command.

He shall in like manner make out and sign, in duplicate, a declaration stating the place and time of the detention, the name of the vessel, and that of her master, the names of the persons composing her crew, and the number and condition of the slaves found on board.

This declaration shall further contain an exact description of the state of the vessel and her cargo.

Thirdly. The commander of the cruiser shall, without delay, carry or send the detained vessel, with her master, crew, passengers, cargo, and the slaves found on board, to one of the ports hereinafter specified, in order that proceedings may be instituted in regard to them, conformably to the laws of the country under whose flag the vessel is sailing; and he shall deliver the same to the competent authorities, or to the persons who shall have been specifically appointed for that purpose by the Government to whom such port shall belong.

Fourthly. No person whatever shall be taken out of the detained vessel; nor shall any part of her cargo, nor any of the slaves found on board be removed from her, until after such vessel shall have been delivered over to the authorities of her own nation; unless the removal of the whole or part of the crew, or of the slaves found on board, shall be deemed necessary, either for the preservation of their lives, or from any other consideration of humanity, or for the safety of the persons who shall be charged with the navigation of the vessel, after her detention. In any such case, the commander of the cruiser, or the officer appointed to bring in the detained vessel, shall make a declaration of such removal, in which he shall specify the reasons for the same; and the masters, sailors, passengers, or slaves, so removed, shall be carried to the same port as the vessel and her cargo, and they shall be received in the same manner as the vessel, agreeably to the regulations hereinafter set forth.

Provided, always, that nothing in this paragraph shall be understood as applying to slaves found on board of Austrian, Prussian, or Russian vessels; but such slaves shall be disposed of as is specified in the following paragraphs:

Fifthly. All Austrian vessels which shall be detained on the stations of America or Africa by the cruisers of the other contracting parties, shall be carried and delivered up to the Austrian jurisdiction at Trieste.

But, if slaves shall be found on board any such Austrian vessel at the time of the detention, the vessel shall, in the first instance, be sent to deposite the slaves at that port to which she would have been taken for adjudication, if she had been sailing under the English or French flag. The vessel shall afterwards be sent on, and shall be delivered up to the Austrian jurisdiction at Trieste, as above stipulated.

All French vessels which shall be detained on the eastern coast of Africa by the cruisers of the other contracting parties shall be carried and delivered up to the French jurisdiction at Goree.

All French vessels which shall be detained on the coast of America to the southward of the 10th degree of north latitude by the cruisers of the other contracting parties shall be carried and delivered up to the French jurisdiction at Cayenne.

All French vessels which shall be detained in the West Indies, or on the coast of America to the northward of the 10th degree of north latitude, by the cruisers of the other contracting parties, shall be carried and delivered up to the French jurisdiction at Martinique.

All British vessels which shall be detained on the western coast of Africa by the cruisers of the other contracting parties, shall be carried and delivered up to the British jurisdiction at Bathurst, on the river Gambia.

All British vessels which shall be detained on the eastern coast of Africa by the cruisers of the other contracting parties, shall be carried and delivered up to the British jurisdiction at the Cape of Good Hope.

All British vessels which shall be detained on the coast of America by the cruisers of the other contracting parties, shall be carried and delivered up to the British jurisdiction at the colony of Demarara, or at Port Royal, in Jamaica, according as the commander of the cruiser may think most convenient.

All British vessels which shall be detained in the West Indies by the cruisers of the other contracting parties, shall be carried and delivered up to the British jurisdiction at Port Royal, in Jamaica.

All Prussian vessels which shall be detained on the stations of America or Africa by the cruisers of the other contracting parties, shall be carried and delivered up to the Prussian jurisdiction at Stettin.

But if slaves shall be found on board any such Prussian vessel at the time of her detention, the vessel shall, in the first instance, be sent to deposite the slaves at that port to which she would have been taken for adjudication if she had been sailing under the English or French flag. The vessel shall afterwards be sent on, and shall be delivered up to the Prussian jurisdiction at Stettin, as above stipulated.

All Russian vessels which shall be detained on the stations of Africa or America by the cruisers of the other contracting parties, shall be carried and delivered up to the Russian jurisdiction at Cronstadt, or at Reval, according as the season of the year may allow the one or the other of those ports to be reached.

But if slaves shall be found on board any such Russian vessel at the time of her detention, the vessel shall, in the first instance, be sent to deposite the slaves at that port to which she would have been taken for adjudication if she had been sailing under the English or French flag. The vessel shall afterwards be sent on, and shall be delivered up to the Russian jurisdiction at Cronstadt, or at Reval, as above stipulated.

Sixthly. As soon as a merchant vessel which shall have been detained as aforesaid, shall arrive at one of the ports or places above mentioned, the commander of the cruiser, or the officer appointed to bring on such detained vessel, shall forthwith deliver to the authorities duly appointed for that purpose by the Government within whose territory such port or such place shall be, the vessel and her cargo, together with the master, crew, passengers, and slaves found on board, and also the papers which shall have been seized on board the vessel, and one of the duplicate lists of the said papers, retaining the other in his own possession. Such officer shall, at the same time, deliver to the said authorities one of the original declarations, as hereinbefore specified, adding thereto a statement of any changes which may have taken place from the time of the detention of the vessel to that of the delivery, as well as a copy of the statement of any removals which may have taken place as above provided for.

In delivering over these several documents, the officer shall make, in writing and on oath, an attestation of their truth.

Seventhly. If the commander of a cruiser of one of the high contracting parties, who shall be duly furnished with the aforesaid special instructions, shall have reason to suspect that a merchant vessel, sailing under convoy of, or in company with, a ship of war of any one of the other contracting parties, is engaged in the slave-trade, or has been fitted out for the purpose of that traffic, or has been engaged in the traffic in slaves during the voyage in which she is met with by the said cruiser, he shall confine himself to communicating his suspicions to the commander of the ship of war; and he shall leave it to the latter to proceed alone to visit the suspected vessel, and to deliver her up to the jurisdiction of her own country, if there should be cause for doing so.

Eighthly. By article fourth of the treaty, it is stipulated that, in no case, shall the mutual right of visit be exercised upon ships of war by the high contracting parties.

It is agreed that this exemption shall apply equally to vessels of the Russian-American Company; which, being commanded by officers of the imperial navy, are authorized by the Imperial Government to carry a flag which distinguishes them from the merchant navy, and are armed and equipped similarly to transports of war.

It is further understood that the said vessels shall be furnished with a Russian patent, which shall prove their origin and destination. The form of this patent shall be drawn up by common consent. It is agreed that this patent, when issued by competent authority in Russia, shall be countersigned at St. Petersburgh by the consulates of Great Britain and France.

Ninthly. In the third clause of article nine of the treaty, it is stipulated that, failing proof to the contrary, a vessel shall be presumed to be engaged in the slave-trade if there be found on board spare plank fitted for being laid down as a second or slave deck.

In order to prevent any abuse which might arise from an arbitrary interpretation of this clause, it is especially recommended to the cruisers not to apply it to Austrian, Prussian, or Russian vessels employed in the timber trade, whose manifest shall prove that the planks and joists which they have, or have had, on board, are, or were, a part of their cargo for trade.

Therefore, in order not to harass lawful commerce, cruisers are especially enjoined only to act upon the stipulations contained in the third clause of article nine, when there shall be on board the vessel visited spare plank evidently destined to form a slave deck.

The undersigned plenipotentiaries have agreed, in conformity with the eighteenth article of the treaty signed by them this day, that these instructions shall be annexed to the treaty signed this day between Great Britain, Austria, France, Prussia, and Russia, for the suppression of African slave-trade, and shall be considered as an integral part of that treaty.

In witness whereof, the plenipotentiaries of the high contracting parties have signed this annex, and have hereunto affixed the seal of their arms.

SPEECH OF MR. SMITH,

OF CONNECTICUT.

In Senate of the United States, February 20, 1843—On the bill to restore to General Jackson the fine of one thousand dollars imposed on him by Judge Hall, for an alleged contempt of court.

Having cherished the idea, Mr. President, that the nationality of this subject would hush all party feelings, and soften the asperity of partisans, I have hitherto abstained from taking any part in the discussions, supposing all would be united in restoring the fine imposed upon General Jackson at New Orleans. I am, however, constrained to believe that I am to be disappointed in the conclusion I had arrived at, and that a different result is now to be apprehended. I shall therefore take such a party view of it only as its present aspect demands, without relinquishing the idea that it has not, and will not, wholly assume that character. The subject is one deeply involving the interests and character of the nation. The pride and national feelings of every American should elevate him far above sectional and party prejudices, and induce him to investigate the subject with no other partiality upon his mind than that which every patriotic American is proud to acknowledge—that America is his country.

Though all agree that General Jackson achieved a victory at New Orleans over our common enemy, of no ordinary character; and that he won unfading laurels for himself, and gave to America among the nations of the earth a proud eminence; yet there seems to be a disposition in some to withhold from him the meed that is to be found only in the public approbation of the measures which were adopted by the General to save the people of New Orleans from a calamity and dishonor from which they had no hope of escape, except it was by means of the resources of that superior general and extraordinary man, General Jackson; and to save the nation from a disgrace which none would be willing to witness, except the external and internal enemies of republican America. He alone, in this perilous moment, was looked to as a commander of our forces, for the salvation of New Orleans and of our country; and he, and the few patriots constituting the little American army under his command, are entitled to the whole credit of accomplishing these two great and important objects. The facts in relation to this fine are to be found in the history of our country. It is unnecessary to be particular in adverting to them here.

I shall have occasion hereafter to present them to the Senate, in connexion with other facts, for the purpose of showing the necessity and propriety of the measures and means taken to defend our territory against invasion by a public enemy. It is claimed that, in defending New Orleans, General Jackson came in contact with, and trampled down and disregarded, the civil institutions and functionaries of our Government, by declaring and enforcing martial law in aid of his military movements and plans; and, therefore, the fine ought not to be unconditionally remitted. Many of those who believe that General Jackson did no more than was required of him by the American people as their general, seem to be disposed to admit that he violated the laws of his country, but ought to be excused on the ground of necessity. I admit no such thing, Mr. President. I do not hesitate to say, and I feel able to show it, that General Jackson violated no law; nor did he, in making his defence, transcend his powers, or abuse those of the civil department of our Government. If I am correct in this, the fine was wrongly and unjustly imposed, and ought to be remitted without any qualification whatever, and with interest

Did not the almost irrepressible indignity of the people of New Orleans at the assumed power of Judge Hall to sit and act as judge in his own behalf, and impose the fine on General Jackson, for what Hall was pleased to call a contempt of his court, show that no indifferent court or jury could have been found in any part of the Union to im[pose] a fine upon the General for his noble and patri[otic] defence of New Orleans? My defence of General Jackson is, that he did no more than any other citizen, or every other one of the United States, might have done, to prevent a violation of our territory by a public enemy;—nay, no more than was required of every patriot in the Union. I address myself to the reason, and not to the passion. If I can have the exercise of reason in deciding this question, I do not fear the result. What is martial law, as enforced at New Orleans by General Jackson, but physical power which our common Creator has given us for self-preservation; and which every man, and all men, have always exerted; and which no society or Government has ever dared to impair and much less to take away? Will any one contradict me, when I say that any citizen may defend himself and property against the unwarrantable illegal attack of another, though he be a citizen, even unto death of the assailant, if necessary? I presume not. Will any one deny the principle that what one may do to defend himself and property, another, or ever so many, may do to defend him? I presume not.

If these principles are admitted, or established, I am sure I shall have no difficulty in defending General Jackson, unless he wantonly abused the power he exercised. And let me here observe, Mr. President, that General Jackson was no more liable for an error of judgment, if such should be found to be the fact, (which no one claims, that I have heard,) than a judge upon the bench would be for an error of judgment. That we may not confound the terms military and physical, when I speak of them, I use them as synonymous in relation to this subject. They are one and the same thing, as opposed to civil power. When both the civil and military powers are in healthy action, I readily agree to the principle, that the military is subordinate to the civil power. But I know of no instance where physical power may not be exerted to prevent the commission, or for the suppression of crime, or to protect an individual from an assault. Any individual may arrest and secure a criminal, at all times. And can he be made liable for it in a civil action? No one, I think, will claim he can be. And what law justifies the citizen clothed with no civil power to make the arrest, but the paramount law of our nature—the physical power which every man may exercise, and which is paramount to all other laws? If any individual is attempting to commit the crime of arson or burglary, theft, or any other crime, may not any individual, or all who may feel disposed to prevent the act, arrest the criminal? No one will deny this. Suppose civil officers sufficient to prevent the crime were present, and refused to do so: would that prevent individuals who were not officers, and who had no civil power to exercise, from interfering and arresting the individual? No one will pretend that it would, I presume. Suppose the civil officers present, and whose duty it was to take care of the public interest, and prevent the commission of crime, and arrest and secure criminals, should endeavor to prevent the individual and unofficial citizen from performing the act; but he should persist in it, and should prevent the crime, or arrest the criminal: would this make him liable, either to the public or the criminal? No one will pretend it would. If a judge is holding a court, and any one is committing a crime in his presence, may not any individual arrest the criminal? No one, I think, will deny this.

If the court were to send its officers to prevent the arrest, would the unauthorized individual making the arrest then be liable to any one? I think no one will claim this, for the supremacy of the laws, and for the honor of the officials. Will any one claim that such arrest would have been a contempt of court, and the officious individual liable to be fined by the dignified court for it? If he would I would like to hear him. I will now suppose a case, which will approach nearer the case of General Jackson. If a public enemy had entered the court-house where the judge was sitting, or had surrounded it: would not every citizen be justified in beating off the enemy, and killing them, without offending the official dignitary in such manner as to be liable for a contempt? If they were liable to the court for contempt, I suppose they would also be liable for false imprisonment if they captured any of the enemy; or, if they killed any, I suppose they would be liable for murder. But, if the court ld unite his strength with the enemy, and op- the citizens, is any one bold enough to claim the citizens would be liable to any one for an cise of their patriotism?

ow, I would ask whether these cases differ in ciple from that of Judge Hall with Gen. Jack-

If they do, I am not able to perceive the rence. The great crime in his defence of Orleans, with which you charge him, is, that rampled upon our sacred Constitution. But, I ld ask, what is our Constitution worth, when country is gone? And what was the defence lew Orleans, but a struggle for our country? en our country was secure from the enemy, the patriot Jackson the man to trample down disregard that instrument which every patriot rds as holy and sacred? But, while our coun- was in danger, and nothing but pure and un- ed patriotism, with the bravery of a Jackson, ld save it, Judge Hall, a foreigner by birth and entiment, was ready and willing to sacrifice his rty to save the Constitution. What astonish- patriotism he exhibited! The nation duly appre- ed it. But, Mr. President, if I may be permitted ddress myself to a party, I will ask our political onents whether they have, on other occasions, aded as much an infraction of that sacred in- ument, the Constitution? Let me call their at- ion to the alien and sedition laws. All are dy to admit, now, that those laws were unconstitu- al; and no candid man will deny that they re used for the basest purposes while in the ds of the Federalists. The free and unoffend- citizens were seized and forced into loathsome ons; and there incarcerated (many of them) until indignant people hurled them from power, and locked the prison doors, and set at liberty the tims of an austere and revengeful party. For er violations of that sacred instrument, more sh in our minds, let me refer you to the late ap- tionment law, and the remedial justice bill: h of which are too clearly unconstitutional for y sane man to doubt. Several others of the same racter I might refer you to; but I trust I have been unsuccessful in presenting cases enough satisfy the mind of any man that your holy re- rd for the Constitution is seldom awakened en patriotic exertions are most needed. I uld not omit to notice a bank of the United tes, which you have chased under that vagrant wer, so happily described by your leader in his re palmy days, until you have literally worn urselves out.

But to return, Mr. President, to the law paramount all others, either political, civil, or international— law of self-preservation I refer to. Let me re- rk here, that it is not alone applicable to indi- iduals, and to private property; but it is applicable bodies of men, and to nations and national prop- y. We ourselves, as an independent and sov- ign nation, have enforced it upon other nations th which we were at peace. I allude to our scent upon the Spanish territory, and dislodging me marauders and outcasts who had taken up eir abode there, and made sallies upon our inhab- nts, and robbed and murdered them, and then treated back into the Spanish territory for safety. he Spanish Government was too feeble to restrain ese outlaws; and, to preserve ourselves from their predations, we took the law of self-preservation— at which General Jackson exercised at New rleans—into our own hands; and, so far as I know, e whole world acquiseced in it, and justified the t.

The British sheltered themselves under the same inciple, when they seized the ships at Copen- gen, and appropriated them to their own use. o independent nation or individual, to my know- dge, denied the correctness of the principle at at time. Whether the circumstances were such to warrant the act, there might well be doubts. he British claimed that these ships were going to the service of another nation at war with them; d therefore, to preserve themselves from destruc- on, they were justified in taking the ships of a iendly nation, because it was not able to pre- nt their use against the British. And do we not men hung under this same law of self-preserva- on, by force of physical power, without the sem- nce of trial, and without even a pretence that act was authorized by any other law than that self-preservation? But let me call the attention the Senate to a recent act of the British, under is same law of self preservation; and the act is ne which, I presume, is indelibly impressed upon the mind of every American patriot. I have ref- erence to the brutal conduct of the British at Schlosser, near Buffalo, in the State of New York, in 1837. They claimed that we were not able, or would not, restrain our citizens from entering their provinces, and exciting their subjects to rebellion; and, consequently, they had a right to enter our territory while we were at peace with them, and exterminate our citizens by fire and sword. Every one knows that the principle of self-preservation could not be applied to that case; and that it was a flagrant violation of our territory, and an insult to our nation. But the British had the impudence to claim that it was under the law of self-preserva- tion that they inflicted the wound upon us. And did we suffer our national escutcheon to be stained by the nefarious act? Let the facts answer. We have, to the grief and mortification of every citizen of the Union, who has an American heart, per- mitted them to go off under that pretence, without even a murmur on our part. The eye of the American nation is turned with scorn upon the negotiations upon this subject; they will be long remembered, and as long despised. But our dis- grace does not end here, Mr. President.

We have, on the insolent demand of the British, passed a law violative of every principle known to civilized nations, and of our Constitution; in effect, authorizing them to repeat the acts with im- punity. This law takes away the criminal juris- diction of the States, whose land is crimsoned with the blood of their inoffensive citizens, by the hand of ruthless vagabonds, and leaves the people of a sovereign State without the least remedy for mur- der, robbery, arson, and burglary, and other in- famous crimes, if committed by a British subject in the employ of his sovereign—no matter what that employment is, whether of a civil or military character. And suppose we had the power and right to pass such a law: what have we got from the British in return for it? Nothing but national disgrace.

But, let me ask, why are you so anxious to sustain the civil power at New Orleans, even at the risk of the loss of our country; while you are so extremely anxious to destroy it at the North, as to pass a palpably unconstitutional law to further your views? Your inconsistencies are to be reconciled only by one supposition—and that is, that your strong- est desire was to place yourselves by the side of the enemies of our country, and in harmony with them. I believe every true American will come to this conclusion, on comparing your conduct on both occasions.

General Jackson at New Orleans only defended his country against the public enemy Did he need a general's commission to authorize him to do this? I hardly think any one will answer this question in the affirmative. If he had, without any commis- sion, but as a private citizen, made the same de- fence that he did with the commission of a major general at New Orleans, I desire to know who is to call him to an account for it, or punish him for it?

No one will doubt, if a citizen has a right to de- fend himself, or his neighbor, against the attack of another citizen of the United States, that he would have a right to defend himself, or his neighbor, against a public enemy. There is a great dis- tinction between the defence of one when at- tacked by a citizen, and by a public enemy. In regard to the latter, any citizen may attack and destroy him without being first attacked. In the former, he has only a right to repel an attack made upon him without right. What pow- er could Judge Hall have exerted to punish a pub- lic enemy at New Orleans, other than that exer- cised by General Jackson—physical power? If every soldier had been captured and delivered over to Judge Hall, bound hand and foot—even if he had killed our citizens—Judge Hall could not have punished them; they would be treated as prisoners of war. Why, then, yield to him the physical power, and lay it at his feet, when the enemy were at your doors, and he refused to ex- ercise it, and could not the civil power? If his patriotism had been as pure as General Jackson's, he would have exercised the same power that General Jackson did to expel a ferocious and vin- dictive enemy.

Situated as General Jackson was, with raw and undisciplined troops—not much above one-third in number as many as the enemy had of what they called invincibles—could he be justified in doing less than he did? The enemy had for their motto "beauty and booty." What could have been more ex- citing and animating to a licentious soldiery? No one claims that he did more than his duty in any par- ticular, except it was to subject Judge Hall and his associates to his control while he was defend- ing the place. And may we not reasonably con- clude, if the Judge had not patriotism enough either to help to defend himself, or suffer the Gen- eral to carry out his plans unmolested in making the defence at that critical moment, that he had none too much to give aid to the enemy—indirect- ly, if not directly? I think we may; and so I think a large majority of the people of this county be- lieve.

To defend the city of New Orleans, it became necessary to establish a cordon of posts around it, and to guard effectually every passage and avenue to the city. The city must necessarily become a part of the General's camp. How easy would it have been for the enemy to communicate with dis- affected citizens in the midst of his camp, if he could not have the entire control of all the ground within his posts? With all the power the General had exercised, and with all the guards he had placed round the city, it was well known that there was a constant communication between the enemy and the city. A quartermaster in the British army (Peddie) boasted that he had every day from the city, from seven or eight persons, all the information he wanted in relation to our movements. Every true American in New Orleans could be trusted; but a large portion of the people were mere adventurers from various nations, without any attachment to our country; and most of them were hostile to our Government and our institutions, and mere despera- does ready and willing, and waiting only for an opportunity, to unite with our enemies. One whole village but a short distance on the bank of the river from New Orleans, was composed of Spanish and Portuguse, who aided and assisted the British in disembarking their troops, and acted as spies upon us, and as pilots to the British. They were known as banditti. General Jack- son was informed, before he reached Louisiana, by the highest and most reliable authority, that it was filled with spies and traitors.

The Governor of the State informed him that there was a great spirit of dissatisfaction with many, and great despondency with the patriotic portion of the population.

It was well known that every desperate band of outlaws in the vicinity were leagued with the enemy, and were ready to share with them in the pillage and plunder of the city.

The subject of martial law, before it was de- clared, was fully discussed in the presence of Judge Hall, who apparently approved it. The Governor, and many other functionaries, and all patriots, advised its adoption.

And no reasonable man, I think, will doubt that it was absolutely necessary to save the city from the sackage of a licentious soldiery, and of their motto being fully verified. But we have only to advert to one act of Judge Hall's, to know that he acquiesced in the necessity of the measure, or that he was a traitor to his country.

In making preparation for the defence, Judge Hall assumed the power to open the prison doors, and to let out all the criminals to assist either the enemy or the friends of our country; and many pirates then in prison, among others, were dis- charged, and let loose, and went at large among the citizens. If this was for the purpose of aiding the defence, it is conclusive evidence that he thought all that General Jackson did was necessary: and much more, because his own act was a much greater violation of duty than any that was im- puted to General Jackson—unless it was absolutely necessary for self-preservation, and then neither was a violation of duty.

Which would inflict the deepest wound upon the civil power of our country—for a general, while defending his country against invasion by a public enemy, to arrest a judge of the court, when he sup- posed he was (at least indirectly) co-operating with the enemy; or for a judge to open the prison doors, and let loose all the criminals, including many pi- rates, whose lives were forfeited to an injured country, to again commit piracy, and other crimes little inferior in degree of enormity? I leave it to every candid mind for decision. That the civil power was adequate to the defence of New Orleans, no one will pretend. What, then, was left to de- fend it but the military? None. No candid man,

I think, believes this was exercised in an unreasonable manner; or with more severity than the occasion required.

Let us take a brief view of the facts in relation to the arrest of Judge Hall by General Jackson, and for which Hall sat in his own case, and, from the impulse of his own sense of a personal wrong, inflicted a fine of one thousand dollars upon the General.

The line of sentries stationed by General Jackson for the defence of New Orleans, and to guard it against the assault of the enemy, included the city of New Orleans; and martial law, to have any effect, must be maintained within these lines. All, of course, within the range of them, must be subject to its action. The business of the Legislature had been suspended; and all who wished the city saved, readily submitted to its authority. Information was received from the British fleet that peace had been concluded between the United States and Great Britain. The newspapers took up the subject, and endeavored to create uneasiness among the people, and to induce them to believe that martial law was unnecessary. The General thought, as did all other prudent men, that this was a devise of the enemy to get some advantage of our troops. A general order was announced, prohibiting any publication in the papers affecting the army.

The French consul (Toussard) granted certificates to all Frenchmen, as well to those in our service as to those out of it, that, being subjects of the French King, they could not be held to do military duty. This caused a good deal of uneasiness. An order was then made, directing such French subjects as had the certificates of the French consul, countersigned by the Commanding General, to retire without the military lines. Soon after this, a publication appeared in the newspaper, if not designed, calculated to excite mutiny among our troops. This was an entire misrepresentation of the order, representing that all Frenchmen, without distinction, were ordered out of the city, and calling upon them to rally round the standard of the French consul. Some of the troops abandoned their posts, in consequence of this mutinous publication. The author of this publication was Louallier, a member of the Legislature. If this is a fair specimen of the patriotism about New Orleans during that trying time, I believe no one will blame General Jackson for distrusting them. General Jackson caused Louallier to be arrested. Judge Hall issued a writ of habeas corpus to take Louallier from the custody of the military officers. The General arrested the Judge; and finally ordered him to be removed beyond his camp. When the camp was broken up, and martial law ceased, the Judge returned, and seized the General, and brought him before himself, to answer for a contempt of his court, and imposed the fine upon him which it is the object of this bill to remove, or relinquish to the General, as a token of the approbation of the American people for his defence of New Orleans. I need not ask what the tendency of Louallier's conduct was, nor what was his design in the mutinous publication. The facts which came to light answer both questions. The consequence was an abandonment of the military posts by the soldiers, and a perfect satisfaction on the part of Louallier, and of Hall too, or Hall would not have undertaken to screen Louallier from punishment. How does the conduct of these two men stand before the world, as contrasted with General Jackson's? Comment from me is unnecessary. The grateful people of America have shown their approbation of the General's conduct, by electing him President of the United States. Let the crowning act of approbation be consummated by a remission of this unjust fine—a fine to which the United States have no more right than I have.

If you desire to see a picture designed by British artists for New Orleans, turn your eye to the Celestial Empire; and there you will behold the fairest fabric of God's workmanship, with her loving and loved offspring, rushing into the flaming fire, the yawning gulf, the deep abyss, to escape the contaminating touch of a licentious British soldiery. Such a death did these innocent people prefer, to such a brutal, licentious infliction of a British behest, and with which New Orleans was threatened; and such a calamity, nothing but unrestrained physical power, directed by the most indomitable patriotism and unconquerable bravery, could have averted. What could the civil power have done to save this valuable portion of our American population from such a disaster and disgrace, if it could have acted with its most plenary power? All will answer, unhesitatingly, Nothing at all. And for what, I would ask, was this heart-rending barbarity inflicted upon this unoffending people? Because they refused to eat the poisonous drugs of this bloodthirsty people, and degrade, and disgrace, and ruin themselves, to gratify British cupidity, and pay them an extravagant price for it; and to replenish an exhausted national treasury, after failing to supply it, by an appropriation of the blood, bones, and muscles of a great portion of their laboring people. And how came this treasury exhausted? By bestowing it upon sinecures, and pampered and bloated aristocrats, who had never rendered to the people for it a pin's value of service. And how came New Orleans in danger of such a British outrage as we see inflicted upon the Chinese? Because America dared to defend her hardy seamen from outrages more daring, and, if possible, more cruel. From six to ten thousand of American seamen had already been seized, while peaceably sailing under our flag, and were compelled to fight the battles of our public enemy, and defend a marauding and predatory commercial marine, sent forth to the remotest corner of the earth, to sack and pillage the fairest portion of the civilized world, or be tied to the masts of her floating hells, and be flayed alive. Many valuable lives of American citizens, which came to our knowledge, were taken in this cruel and barbarous manner; and probably many more, that never came to light. Many broken-hearted fathers, mothers, brothers, and sisters, mourned the loss of their friends, thus butchered and sacrificed, and on whom they relied for a daily support. What think you of the people of New Orleans? Do you think they would wait for civil etiquette, and, for fear of offending the magisterial dignity of a prostrate judge, who could neither avert the impending calamity nor punish the offenders, forbear to call on the physical power—the only one that could afford them any relief or protection?

SPEECH OF MR. CHOATE,

OF MASSACHUSETTS.

In Senate of the United States, February 3, 1843—On the bill to authorize the adoption of measures for the occupation and settlement of the Territory of Oregon, for extending certain portions of the laws of the United States over the same, and for other purposes.

The bill for the occupation and settlement of the Territory of Oregon (which had been previously discussed by Mr. CHOATE and other Senators) again coming up for consideration on this day—

Mr. CHOATE spoke nearly as follows:

I wish, sir, before others resume the regular discussion of the measure under consideration, to say something upon two or three topics in the speeches of different Senators who have done me the honor to make reply to what I urged against the bill a few days ago. It is not my purpose to debate the subject at large, and over again, nor to attempt an answer in detail to any one of the able arguments which have been addressed to us. I objected, and now object, to that provision of the bill only which grants, or engages to grant, lands to future settlers of the Oregon Territory. The provision forms the matter of part of the first section, and is expressed in these words:

"Provision hereafter shall be made by law to secure and grant six hundred and forty acres, or one section of land, to every white male inhabitant of the Territory of Oregon, of the age of eighteen years and upward, who shall cultivate and use the same for five consecutive years, or to his heir or heirs at law, if such there be, in case of his decease. And to every such inhabitant or cultivator, being a married man, there shall be granted, in addition, one hundred and sixty acres to the wife of said husband, and the like quantity of one hundred and sixty acres to the father for each child under the age of eighteen years he may have, or which may be born within the five years."

My objection to it was, and is, that it infringes, or subjects this Government to a specious accusation of infringing, that clause in the existing convention with Great Britain which declares that "any country that may be claimed by either party on the northwest coast of America, westward of the Stony Mountains, shall, together with the harbors, bays, and creeks, and the navigation of all rivers within the same, be free and open to the vessels, citizens, and subjects of the two powers." I would not infringe that convention, because it is honorable, and politic as well as honorable, to perform with punctilious exactness, and in liberal measure, all our engagements as a nation.

Well, sir, upon one great point, at least, we all concur. Everybody agrees that, if the bill infringes the convention, it ought not to pass without amendment. The Senator from Missouri, [Mr LINN,] the framer of the bill, and now and long the zealous and able advocate of the general policy which it pursues, speaking for all its friends, agrees to this. On the other hand, if the convention were out of the way, I do not know that it might not receive a general vote. Whether it violates the convention, therefore, or exposes itself to a colorable charge of doing so, or not, is the precise and only question.

It is obvious, then, Mr. President, that a great deal of the matter which has been pressed into the debate is irrelevant, and useless to the actual inquiry: I hope that some of it may not prove to be mischievous as well as useless. Right or wrong in their advice, Senators have not been very sparing of it, nor very successful in showing us how it touches the immediate deliberation. Whether it would be wise or unwise now to give the notice prescribed by the convention for terminating it, and thus at the year running, at the end of which it must expire by its own provisions; whether it would be wise or unwise, if there were no public faith in the way, to take military occupation of the whole territory to the forty-ninth degree at once; whether it would be wise or unwise to plant "fifty thousand rifles" on the banks of the Columbia, as the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAPPAN] so coolly counsels—a thing more easily said than done—and, like the meditated murder in the great tragedy, not "done when 'tis done;" whether it would be better still to send these same rifles to conquer England in Ireland, or to unfurl the standard of transatlantic liberty in the streets of London or on the coast of Kent, as other Senators have less distinctly recommended;—whether any, or all, or none of these things may be desirable and prudent, nobody proposes that we shall begin by breaking our word. Better auspices would better commence undertakings so delicate and so magnificent. If, as Senators predict, a war with England is to come so soon; if she really is closing her vast serpent folds about us, and seeking her moment to crush us to death; if the black regiments are organized, and the armed steamers are built, by which she means to convey her fatal gift of revolutionary emancipation to the vulnerable and inflammable South and Southwest;—if such a war as this is to come so soon, how much more desirable than ever that it shall find our honor without a stain! Other preparation I do not undervalue; other armor you must forge and put on; but he who has this is clad already "in complete steel."

There is one question only, then, and that the least discussed of any in this wide debate: Does the bill, in its grant, or promise of grant of land, break the convention? In other words: having agreed, as a Government, that this Territory of Oregon, and every part of it, shall remain free and open to all the subjects of England, as well as to the citizens of our own country, until the expiration of twelve months after notice of the termination of the agreement, can we now, before such notice, do an act, as a Government, intended and calculated to exclude the subjects of England from the territory, in part or whole; to parcel it out into farms; to enclose those farms with stone walls; to lay them down in grain and grass; to vest the title to them in American citizens, in absolute property, for the maintenance of which against all the world the public treasure and public faith are solemnly engaged? This is the question, and really it answers itself. You have agreed that, as a Government, you will do nothing to prevent this territory, and every part of it, from being free and open to the subjects of England, and to your own countrymen, until the convention expires. Perhaps you have agreed that you will take care that your citizens shall do nothing to prevent it from being open. But certainly you have agreed that, as a Government, you will do nothing yourselves to shut it up. And yet, by this bill, do you not do an act, as a Government, intended and calculated to close the territory, in part or in whole, against English occupation and enjoyment? Do you not invite colonists to settle on it by the promise of a perfect title? I nough of them should go—as enough may go, and re invited by the bill to go—to take up, fence in, lough and sow every acre of it on which a man an live, do you not engage to all of them such a itle? Do you not then take and grant the whole erritory, in exclusive property and occupation, to American citizens? And is this to leave it "free nd open" to the subjects of England? Why, sir, n five years, if this bill produces the entire effect or which its provisions are calculated, and of rhich they are capable, not an Englishman could et his foot on the territory for agriculture, trade, r hunting. His entry would be a trespass on American title, and the entry of his Government n invasion and a war on you. I do not say that his result is undesirable; but I do say you cannot chieve it till you have put an end to the convenion. You cannot shut up and appropriate a territory, or an acre of it, consistently with an agreement to keep it all free and open. Common sense, ommon honesty, the municipal law, the judgments of the nations, concur in this. The attempt s to reconcile things irreconcilable; and the fifty housand rifles of the Senator from Ohio are unqual to it.

But I discussed this subject so much at large the ther day, that I will not pursue it further. In ruth, the only plausible defence of this part of the ill which we have heard attempted, is, not that it oes not disregard and infringe the convention, ut that England has set the example of disregarding and infringing it, and therefore we may do so oo.

Now, sir, if the fact is proved, I accede to the nference. If England puts a construction upon the convention which authorizes the two Governments to proceed to colonize the territory by independent policy; if she waives, deserts, and breaks the convention in this behalf, then you may pass this bill. Certainly, the bargain binds both or neither.

But, Mr. President, I am not afraid of being called the apologist of England when I declare that I see no proof at all that she violates the convention, as I construe it. He must be a very vulgar debater, and that a very vulgar assembly, by whom and in which an attempt to persuade a nation to preserve its own honor by the argument that its great foreign rival has preserved his, should be stigmatized as an unpatriotic apologist for that great rival. No Senator here will descend to such an imputation on another. I say, then, I see no evidence of any act of the English Government which justifies the act proposed to us. That the convention operates to her advantage, and against ours, is probably true; that her subjects are silently and widely occupying the territory, culling out its choicest parts, taking up its best mill-seats, reclaiming its best land, and extending the English name, national character, attachments, sympathies, and connexions, all over it, forming it slowly into another English colony, may be true. This may make it quite expedient to terminate the convention. It may make it quite necessary to assert the doctrine, that no possession taken by an English subject during the existence of the convention can be allowed to confer title. It does unquestionably make it necessary that a wise and a firm and a good-tempered diplomacy should, without one moment's delay, undertake the adjustment of this great question of the Oregon. But what I say is, that I see no governmental act of England which breaks the convention. Senators argue this point a great deal too much at large. The question is, not whether the English national temper is or is not respectful and friendly towards this country; it is not whether she once fired into the Chesapeake frigate in a time of peace; not whether her ulterior purposes in maintaining so many lines of steam-ships are wicked or charitable; not whether her hand is red with the blood of China and Affghanistan; not whether she meditates the gift of liberty to all the enslaved; not whether she is proud, ambitious, grasping; not whether that which is so definitely and intelligibly called her "general attitude" towards us is lionlike or lamblike, rampant or couchant. All these inquiries are important to our general duties of statesmanship. As we may answer them one way or another, we may have to negotiate, to protest, to arm, to fight. But to the deliberation of this moment, these inquiries are worse than irrelevant. The question is, Does the English Government grant land in the Oregon Territory to English subjects, to be enjoyed and owned exclusively and adversely to all the world? Sir, there seems to be no proof of this at all. What the English hunters and traders may have done, I do not inquire. I look to the Government; and what the Government has said, and what it has done, I once before have brought to the notice of the Senate. In the act of 2d July, 1821, by which the privilege of hunting and trading is granted to the Hudson Bay Company, are these words:

"IV. And whereas, by a convention entered into between his Majesty and the United States of America, it was stipulated and agreed that any country on the northwest coast of America, to the westward of the Stony Mountains, should be free and open to the citizens and subjects of the two powers for the term of ten years from the date of the signature of that convention:

"Be it therefore enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall be deemed or construed to authorize any body corporate, company, or person to whom his Majesty may have, under the provisions of this act, made a grant or given a license of exclusive trade with the Indians in such parts of North America as aforesaid, to claim or exercise any such exclusive trade within the limits specified in the said article, to the prejudice or exclusion of any citizens of the said United States of America who may be engaged in the said trade: Provided always, That no British subject shall trade with the Indians within such limits, without such grant or license as is by this act required."

This, sir, is the legislation of England under the convention which we are about to break. I confess I should regret to see her legislation, and the legislation which is proposed here, presented together to the moral judgment of the world.

I have no more to say, sir, upon the expediency of passing this bill. Two better courses certainly are open to you. Put an end to the convention at once; and then, at the expiration of the year, proceed to plant a colony in the territory. This is one course. But another is better still. Leave all things as they are, and instantly enter upon a negotiation which shall close forever the last of the questions which is of magnitude enough to endanger the peace of two great nations, of one blood and one faith.

I desire now, Mr. President, to say something upon two or three topics introduced into the debate by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON.] To much of his able address to the Senate I assent entirely. To other portions of it I cannot assent; and on these I beg to submit a few remarks, with the deference which is due to him, but with the freedom which is due to the Senate from every Senator.

I understood the honorable Senator to remind you, that some time since the Senate, upon his motion, made a call upon the President to apprize this body what were those "informal communications" which, in his message transmitting the recent treaty for our approval, during the last session, the President says had been had with the British minister upon the subject of the Territory of the Oregon; and that to this call the President replied, that the information sought for could not be given without detriment to the public interest. The honorable Senator then proceeded to declare that, in his opinion, this reply was not true, and was not sincere; and that it was designed to conceal the real reason for not answering the call; which was, that the disclosure of the "informal communications" would disgrace the American negotiator, by showing that he had offered to draw a line of boundary south of the parallel of forty-nine.

Now, sir, in so far as the honorable Senator confined himself to a denial that the public interest would suffer by a revelation of this matter, and to an argument to prove that it ought to have been given, I have little to say. I may be permitted—the youngest and least experienced of this body, replying to one of its oldest, most experienced, and most distinguished members—to suggest a doubt whether such a commentary on such a communication from the Executive Government has been usual, and even whether it was ever made before. I had thought that a politic decorum had established the practice of receiving such communications from such a source as absolute truth. I had supposed that the indispensable intercourse of the departments of Government, their respective constitutional functions, independence, and responsibilities, all required this.

But, sir, if it may be considered and discussed as an open question, whether the President has told us the truth, and whether his opinion that the public interests required these communications to be withheld is a well-founded one or not, I must be permitted to say that I cannot doubt for a moment that the Executive determination was both sincere and discreet. How could we have expected beforehand any other answer? Why, sir, the business of the Oregon is at this moment the subject of actual negotiation between the Governments. It has been so for years. In his message at the commencement of the present session of Congress, the President declares his purpose to be to conclude an early settlement of it, if practicable. Such is my inference from his language. In this posture of our affairs, so important and delicate, would it be a usual and a sensible proceeding, or a strange and impolitic one, to publish to the world from day to day the informal conversations of the representatives of the two powers? Was such a thing ever heard of? The honorable Senator says that our claim to the Oregon Territory is, and always was, a uniform and decided one, never shifting, never timid; and that there is nothing at all to be concealed. Well, sir, and what then? So was our claim in the Northeast a uniform and confident claim. So always has been our claim upon the great subjects of impressment and the right of search; but when these claims, or any claims, or any subjects, become matters of actual controversy, and are brought within the province of diplomacy, do not the law, and the usage, and the immemorial expediences of diplomatic treatment apply to them; and are they not to be discussed and put in shape for adjustment according to the customary course of diplomacy?

Let me remind you that there may be reasons for at least the usual prudence of secrecy, urgently and peculiarly applicable to this question. Remember that, according to the theory of England upon the subject, it is a question to which not she and we alone, but we and the whole world are parties. She asserts no title in herself, but alleges that it belongs to all the nations. If so, all of them—except Russia, Spain, and France, who may be thought to have quitclaimed—all the other nations are parties; and then England and this Government are in truth meditating an arrangement excluding all the rest, and appropriating the whole to themselves. Under any possible principle of adjustment, they would hardly be expected to reveal the whole course of love from day to day, running smooth or broken, in the presses of London and Washington.

But, sir, it was not this which I proposed to say. I desired chiefly to assure the Senator and the Senate that the apprehension intimated by him, that a disclosure of these informal communications would disgrace the American Secretary, by showing that he had offered a boundary line south of the parallel of forty-nine, is totally unfounded. He would be glad to hear me say that I am authorized and desired to declare, that in no communication, formal or informal, was such an offer made, and that none such was ever meditated.

The honorable Senator complains of the treaty of last summer, for not seuling this question of the Oregon. It is one of its great sins of omission which he charges, as he has done more than once before.

Let me say, sir, (what I need scarcely to say,) that this forms no objection to the treaty, which does not lie against our whole past series of diplomacy. Always this question of the Oregon has borne exactly the same relation to all our questions with England that it bore last summer. Always it has been thought important enough to be discussed with other subjects, and never has it been quite matured for adjustment, and never thought quite so important as to hinder the adjustment of other questions which were matured. How many treaties have you made with England—how much diplomatic conversation have you had with her, since Captain Gray discovered and named the Columbia river? And yet, through the whole series—in 1807, 1814, 1816, 1818, and 1826—in the administrations of both the last Presidents always there has been one course and one result with this subject. It has been treated of; formal and informal communications have been held on it; it has been found to be unripe for settlement; and it has been found to be, or believed to be, not difficult enough, or not pressing enough, to delay or alter the settlement of riper and more pressing elements of contention. There are, and have always been, two reasons for this posture and this fate of the Oregon question. It stands, in the first place, on totally different grounds from the question of the Northeastern boundary. To that, England and this Government were clearly the only parties. That each owned, exclusively of all the world, up to the true line, was certain. Where that line was, depended upon nothing but the meaning of a contract written by the parties themselves. But in the Oregon question, the nations of the whole world have color of interest. England claims for them all. Excepting France, Spain, and Russia, she insists that they all must be parties to that great bill in chancery, by which this controversy of empire shall be finally composed. But, besides this, the controversy itself turns on matter altogether its own. It involves the loftiest and most shadowy speculations of international law. It lies among the very apices juris—the Alpine heights—the transcendentalities of that department of thought. Discovery as a ground of title; its nature, and limitations, and extent; with which party is the fact of first discovery; what occupation must follow to ripen and define it; the effect of interior contiguous possession; the meaning of the old English charters, the Nootka Sound convention, and what not;—these are the Oregon topics, and happy is the negotiator who shall weigh them out, and equalize and settle them without, like the Gaul, putting his sword into the scale!

The other circumstance which has always held the Oregon question in a state of partial insulation, applied with peculiar force to the time when this treaty was made. The Northeastern boundary line required immediate adjustment; the title to Oregon might rest to be tried in its order on the docket. Here, in the Northeastern and in the North was a line running 3,000 miles, between populous States and populous Provinces. It was for hundreds of miles an unsettled line. Excited and numerous communities of two different nations were fiercely disputing where it was. Men stood facing each other with guns on their shoulders, separated by fordable rivers thirty yards wide. The discharge of one single musket would have brought on a war, whose fires would have encircled the world. Did not the exigent circumstances of the hour—did not the ancient and uniform policy of the Government require that this controversy should be settled at once, leaving the distant desert for a space to take care of itself?

I was hurt, therefore, sir, to hear it intimated that a Northern negotiator had neglected and excluded the Oregon, because it was a Western question. You see why it was neglected, and why it was excluded; and you see that it was a wise diplomacy, wheresoever its author was rocked in his cradle. But how long is it, sir, that this has been a Western question, I should like to know? Is it any more a Western question than the China mission, or the Sandwich Island mission is a Western question? Did not the East discover the territory and its great river? Do you not found your title upon the log-book of Captain Gray's good ship Columbia, of Boston? Was it not a Massachusetts man (Captain Wyeth) who first attempted to open a direct trade to it by sea? Was not Astoria settled from the East? Have you not upon your table more memorials from New York and Boston than from all the Union beside, soliciting your attention to this interest? Will not the Nantucket and New Bedford whalemen go there to rest, among his own countrymen and kindred, tired out with the chase of his gigantic game? Will it not be the universal Yankee nation by whom that great valley of the tranquil sea shall be filled? and will they not, one and all, as the day of annual thanksgiving comes round, pause to trace their line with tears of gratitude and pride to the Plymouth Rock? Sir, it is no Western question.

But, sir, the honorable Senator discerns a great deal of mischief in settling part of our differences with England at a time, leaving others open. He perceives it to be a master-stroke of hers, and a capital blunder of yours, to determine the boundary line of the Northern States and the free States, without adjusting the questions which pertain more immediately and exclusively to the West and South.

Sir, I am not sure that I comprehend the point of his complaint.

Did not President Jackson vehemently desire to settle this question of Northeastern boundary by itself? Did he not offer to Maine more than a million of dollars to settle it by itself, according to the King of the Netherlands' award? Sir, we all know that he did. He, whose well-appreciated qualities and services, and well-earned fame, enabled him to despise the vulgar clamor about the fear of England,—he, and all the public men who formed and stood round his Administration, (including, as I had supposed, the honorable Senator himself,) thought it clear gain—a measure of undoubted expediency, as far as it went, to settle one great question at a time. Why, he would have thought it about as absurd to keep all open, because all could not be adjusted instantly and together, as to refuse, if such an offer could be supposed to be made to man, to have any one of the great diseases by which the human race is wasted away, extirpated, until all diseases could be extirpated—holding on to small-pox till you know how cholera and yellow fever are to be disposed of!

And pray, sir, what advantage does England gain over us by the adjustment of this portion of your differences with her? The honorable Senator argues that she is preparing for war with you. She is preparing for immediate war. Released from China and from Affghanistan, she is in the very act of lifting her blood-red hand against your life. The beard is grown already, he thinks, on the chin of the hero who is to turn back the dark tide of that war upon her own coast, and conquer Oregon in the streets of London.

Well, sir, if England is going to war with you so soon, what good is this settlement of the Northeastern line to do her? I have heard of Governments which, meditating a war with one nation, prepared for it by adjusting their differences with other nations; thus securing their friendship or their neutrality. But does England expect to get, by a treaty of peace made this year, a war next year, with one half only of the people and States of this Union? Does she suppose she has given the East, and the great central mass, so satisfactory a boundary line, that they will lie down behind it, and leave the South and West to fight her alone? Do you not know that if one drop of blood is shed on the Columbia river, or one regiment (black or white) landed in Mississippi, this line would be on fire—one long chain of fire—instantaneously, from the St. Croix to the Rocky Mountains? Would this treaty hinder Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, New York, Michigan, from walking over it, without knowing or caring where it is? Would this treaty, or any treaty, or anything, keep the commercial East out of your Southern and Western war? Why, sir, all war—all war of America with England—is a war directly and chiefly on the Eastern Atlantic States. Necessity, interest, not less than patriotism, compel them into participation in it. Every merchant ship, every fishing craft that is driven from the sea, sends a gallant crew to the gun deck, and ensures other laurels to the brows of other Decaturs, and Hulls, and Perrys. So it was in the last war. Hunted from the Grand Banks, the fishermen of Marblehead rallied to the radiant flag of the Constitution; and, in half an hour, broke forever the spell of English invincibility on the sea. Such men are not long in learning their new profession. I was told this story by a distinguished officer in the navy—the first lieutenant of that frigate at the time when she captured the Guerriere: During the action, the officer in command of one of the divisions observed that the firing of his guns had ceased for a short time, and inquired of a sailor the reason. "Sir, (said he,) there is so much smoke, we cannot see; and we are waiting for it to clear up. It is a pity to throw away our shot." This from a fine young fellow of twenty, or thereabouts, who had never seen fire before in his life!

No, Mr. President: while I could wish, undoubtedly, that this treaty had settled everything, I deny that it composes the slightest objection to it, of a positive nature, that it does not settle everything. What is done is altogether good. What is done is not the worse for what is not done. The chances of the continuance of peace are heightened. The hazards of war are diminished. The entire mass and aggregate of our relations with England is disembarrassed, and, if I may so say, dulcified. What is done makes it easier to do all the rest. It sweetens the temper of the parties: it purifies the vision: it calms the passions; it confirms the purpose of the wise and good of both nations to be forever at peace with one another, and to put away forever all war from the kindred races—war, the most ridiculous of blunders, the most tremendous of crimes, the most comprehensive of evils.

The honorable Senator next assails the treaty for what he calls its sins of commission. Having it all with hate unappeasable, he chiefly bestows his indignation on two great concessions which he says it makes to England. The first gives away a strip of mountain territory, some eight or ten miles wide, and one hundred and ten miles long, on the American side of the King of the Netherlands' line. The other changes an important portion of the boundary line west of Lake Superior, and between that lake and the Rainy lake; removes it far south of its true and ancient course; gives to England the old, customary, and best route from Lake Superior towards the Northwest, together with five hundred thousand acres of rock and water, called Hunter's island, and admits her travelling traders to a common use of all the portages upon the new line of boundary actually established. These concessions (so he calls them) he assails vehemently and bitterly. Part of them he has assailed before; all of them he declares his purpose to assail again. He only regrets, he tells us, that this session is too short for what he has to say; but consoles himself with the hope that the forty speeches which he means to make upon the subject at the next session may convey to the country some faint and dim impression of its inexpressible importance and enormities.

Mr. President, it is not my purpose to engage in a general examination and defence of this treaty. Regularly, the subject is not before us. Bills there are, here or in the other House, making appropriations to execute it, on which it must be debated. I would rather reserve myself to that occasion. Besides, sir, why should I, or why should any one, assume the defence of a treaty, here in this body, which but just now, on the amplest consideration, in the confidence and calmness of executive session, was approved by a vote so decisive? Sir, the country, by a vote far more decisive, in a proportion very far beyond thirty-nine to nine, has approved your approval. Some there are—some few, (I speak not now of any member of this Senate,) restless, selfish, reckless, "the cankers of a calm world and a long peace," pining with thirst of notoriety, slaves to their hatred of England—to whom the treaty is distasteful; to whom any treaty, and all things but the glare and clamor, the vain pomp and hollow circumstance, the toil, and agony, and inadequate results, of war—all but these, would be distasteful and dreary. But the country is with you in this act of wisdom and glory: its intelligence, its morality, its labor—its good men, its common men, the thoughtful, the philanthropic, the discreet, the masses—the farmer in his field, the mechanic in his shop, the merchant in his counting-room, the fisherman on the deck of his night-foundered skiff,—are all with you.

It would be quite superfluous, therefore, here or anywhere, to defend an act on which the public judgment of approval has been pronounced with a voice so decisive. Let me, however, sir, before attending to the particular objections of the honorable Senator, submit a view or two of the general character and merits of the treaty as a treaty of boundary.

Consider first, sir, that, by concession of everybody, it is a better treaty than the administration of President Jackson would have most eagerly concluded. You all know, and the country knows, that that eminent person, and his constitutional and unconstitutional advisers, (if such he had,) without exception, desired to adopt the line settled by the award of the King of Holland. Yes, sir, although that award pretended to adjust nothing but the extreme and mere Northeastern question—although it touched no part of the line west of Lake Champlain—although it gave away one hundred thousand acres of New Hampshire, left to Canada a strip of fifty-seven thousand acres which this treaty secures to Vermont and New York, and admitted you to no rights of navigation in the St. John—he and they preferred such a settlement to none; and there were offered to Maine alone a million and a quarter acres of land, estimated to be worth more than a million of dollars, to procure her assent to it.

Well, sir, the treaty of Washington makes a better settlement than that. Such is the judgment of Maine herself. Although she receives from the General Government, under the treaty, nearly a million of dollars less than she might have had for assenting to the award, her sagacity prefers the treaty to the award. She had the offer of the adjustment proposed by the award, during the pendency of the negotiation in this city—[illegible] and she promptly rejected it. A friend has this moment referred me to the report just made by her commissioners to her Legislature, from which I read a passage:

"Secondly. We were given to understand that it was not yet too late to adopt, ratify, and confirm the line recommended by the arbiter, and settle the controversy in that way. In reference to such a proposition, we suggested on our part that, if the limited right to the navigation of the St. John could be conceded as an equivalent, we might bring ourselves, perhaps, to assent to it—particularly if we could mutually agree upon a modification of that line. But every suggestion on our part, as to modifying and narrowing the bounds, and as to equivalents, was met by a prompt and decided negative. If we acceded to that line, it could only be on the basis of the award, simply and purely, and without any equivalent. Would, then, the commissioners of Maine be justified by their fellow-citizens in assenting, in behalf of the State, at this late day, to a ratification of the award of the King of the Netherlands? More than ten years ago, the Legislature of Maine repeatedly and solemnly protested against the ratification of that award. It even refused to trust in the hands of the President and Senate of the United States the discretionary power of ratifying it, although, in case of its eventual ratification, Maine would have realized, as an indemnity, more than two millions of dollars, and avoided all the expense and border troubles to which the controversy has since given occasion. The views of the Legislature, so repeatedly expressed, were opposed to any assent on the part of its agents. The spirit of the resolves under which we derived our authority was opposed to it Considering the course which the Legislature and Executive of Maine have pursued in regard to this matter, the acceptance of such a proposition was out of the question. To have acceded to it, would have been, in our opinion, to disregard the interest of the State, and to trifle with its character and honor."

Sir, the judgment of Maine on the comparative merits of these two arrangements is conclusive. It is the opinion of the party having immeasurably the deepest interest in the matter, and the best means of understanding it.

For years, the whole public mind of the State has been directed to the subject. If the navigation of the St. John is worth anything, or worth nothing, she knows it. If she needs this strip of mountain land, to shelter her giant limbs behind, she knows that also. She is patriotic, as well as attentive to herself; and I disparage nobody when I say that, on all parts and all aspects of this question—national or State, military or industrial—her opinion is worth that of the whole country beside.

Consider, in the next place, that in a broad and obvious view of this long and celebrated controversy of boundary, the whole civilized world will pronounce it terminated honorably to you. The smaller details of the arrangement, the world, history will never know, or will speedily forget. The glory or the shame of the general result will abide, and will form a part of the wide and irresistible opinion pronounced for ages upon your acts and your character. Look, then, at the larger aspect of the dispute and the settlement. Here has been for half a century a contention with England about a territory of twelve thousand square miles, or seven and a half millions of acres. She has claimed it all; we have claimed it all. Like all the controversies of nations, it has been conducted on the high places, and in the eye of the world. Like all such controversies, it has involved an appeal to the judgment of civilization. England, a monarchy—a European monarchy—the first power of the first class of powers, near to the great sources of public opinion, and, by her press, her diplomacy, and her universal intercourse, almost omnipotent to mould that opinion—England has pronounced our claim groundless and insincere. We, a republic, at a distance, have been heard incredulously to assert its validity and its good faith. And what now does the world see? An adjustment by a special minister at Washington, by which four fifths in value of the whole subject in controversy is left to you as your own, and by which, for that one-fifth which she desires to possess, she pays you, over and over, in national equivalents—imperial equivalents—such as a nation may give, such as a nation may receive, satisfactory to your interests, soothing to your honor—the navigation of the St. John, a hundred thousand acres in New Hampshire, fifty thousand acres in Vermont and New York, the point of land commanding the great military way to and from Canada by Lake Champlain, the fair and fertile island of St. George, the surrender of a pertinacious pretension to four millions of acres westward of Lake Superior! Sir, I will not say that this adjustment admits, or was designed to admit, that your title to the whole territory in controversy was perfect and indisputable. I will not do so much injustice to the accomplished and excellent person who represented the moderation and the good sense of the English people and Government in this negotiation. I cannot adopt, even for the defence of a treaty which I so much approve, the language of a writer in the London Morning Chronicle of September last, (and who has been said to be Lord Palmerston,) which over and over asserts that the adjustment "virtually acknowledges the American claim to the whole of the disputed territory," and that "it gives England no share at all—absolutely none; for the capitulation virtually and practically yields up the whole territory to the United States, and then brings back a small part of it in exchange for the right of navigating the St. John." I will not say this. But I say the treaty admits the substantial justice of your general claim. It admits that, in its utmost extent, it was plausible, formidable, and made in pure good faith. It adjudges to you the possession of four-fifths as indisputably your own; and, as considerations of policy made the possession of the rest desirable to England, suppressing the question on the mere right, she pays you for it as nations pay to their equals, "in all love and honor." And how will the world reason on this matter? Will it not say, "Why, America was right, after all; the proudest and most powerful of the nations substantially has admitted that she was right; the fair republic, 'throned by the West,' has not been rapacious, has not made false claim and false clamor; she has asserted her own, and she has obtained her own."

Satisfied, sir, with this general aspect of the controversy and the adjustment, I do not propose to spend time in inquiring whether the equivalents we get for the one-fifth we concede are worth what they cost us exactly in federal money. It is enough that they are given as equivalents, eo nomine, on purpose to soothe and save the point of honor, and that their intrinsical and their comparative value is such that you may accept them as equivalents without reproach to your judgment, or your firmness, or your good faith. And yet I cannot feel a shadow of doubt that what we receive is compensation over and over again for what we concede. Lift aloft to the sky the vast scales in which such values may be weighed, and try by the maxims of imperial traffic the acquisitions of England against the acquisitions of America! To begin with yours. There is the navigation of the St. John. Nobody disputes the value of this concession; but it is said to be a concession to Maine only. Not at all, sir—not at all. It is a concession to the whole country, to commerce, to the mercantile marine, to tonnage, to trade, "as far as winds blow or waters roll." It is said that, by the laws of nations, we were entitled to it. Ay, but did the law of nations give it to you? No more than honor, in Falstaff's catechism, sets broken bones. England, till now, has laughed at the claim on the law of nations; she laughs at it now. She has given it as an equivalent of inappreciable value, opening to the primeval forests, virgin soil, and hardy enterprise of Maine an ample path to the sea, as an equivalent in part for what she receives of the territory in dispute. Ask the people of Maine what they would take for this equivalent.

Then, sir, there are one hundred thousand acres of New Hampshire to which England surrenders her pretensions forever. I know, or I believe, the pretension was groundless; and yet the award of the King of Holland gave it away from you. There is that long margin of fifty-seven thousand acres in Vermont and New York. It belonged to Canada, according to the true line of boundary, as much as Quebec; an American population had settled it under mistake; and by this treaty they retain it, and retain their country too. There is the important island of St. George, lying in the water communication between Lake Huron and Lake Superior, containing more than twenty-five thousand acres of fertile land; and there is the final surrender of a long unsettled claim of England to a southern boundary, and to four millions of acres of land west of Lake Superior. Above all, there is Rouse's Point, at the northern end of Lake Champlain. It is on the Canadian side of the line; nobody now disputes this. We had fortified it formerly, under an erroneous supposition that it was on the American side; and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] reminded you of the deep regret and apprehension with which military men and the War Department (over which he then presided) heard of the ascertainment of the error. This treaty makes it yours. I need not tell you what it is worth. It is far the most important military position on the whole line from the mouth of the St. Croix to the Rocky Mountains. Commanding the only access to invasion from Canada, the old military path along which came the glittering host of Burgoyne, the fleet of Downie, and the army of Prevost, winding across the calm waters of Macdonough's victory, and along and down between Bennington on one side and Saratoga on the other, to Albany and New York; that old classical pass, our Thermopylæ, consecrated by as noble blood, illustrated by as durable glory; two thousand brave men on this position would hold in check an army and a fleet of a hundred thousand.

These, sir, are your equivalents for the three or four millions of acres, the one-fifth of the value in controversy in Maine which you yield—not so much to England, as to peace, to rest, to security, to certainty of national and individual possessions. I leave you to judge if you have not the worth of your money.

But I must now say something to the two particular objections on which the honorable Senator from Missouri has laid out so much good indignation. And, first, he complains that we give up a strip of highlands eight or ten miles wide, and running one hundred and ten miles in length, from Lake Pohenagamook to the Metjarmette portage, which the award of the King of Holland assigned to us.

Sir, this is true. Yet Maine, you see, prefers this treaty to that award; and this concession, and the entire concession to England, you also see, is paid for again and again.

But this particular strip of land. The question is, if, for any purpose of advantage to England, or of detriment to us, it is worth a pin's fee?

Well, sir, that it is good for nothing, for agriculture, lumber, minerals, or any other of the uses of man's life, is admitted. It is a succession of irregular eminences, some of them three thousand feet high, with morasses between them. The growth of the highland is a stinted, worthless forest tree; and of the morass, beds of moss lying upon a waste of rock and water. Throughout, it is unfit, and ever must remain unfit, for cultivation or for habitation. There is nothing upon or beneath the surface of use to anybody or for anything.

But the question still remains, if, in reference to any of the larger objects of her policy or ours, it possesses value? Sir, it is not worth a pound of wet gunpowder, for any purpose, to either Government.

The first object which I suppose England to have had in view in her pursuit of this controversy, has been to obtain a short, secure, and convenient road of communication between New Brunswick and Canada in winter. Now, Lord Palmerston (or whoever is the writer for the London paper from which I have read) asserts that England does not effect this object by this treaty. But, however that may be, certain it is that this treaty gives her no safer, or shorter, or better communication between her provinces than she acquired by the Dutch award. Whether you settle one line or the other, her road from the St. John to the St. Lawrence will pursue exactly the same course; it will be of exactly the same length; it will be just as much exposed, and just as much sheltered.

The second object of England has been thought to be to interpose an unoccupied and uninhabitable space between the Canadian and American population—a sort of non-conductor, as Lord Palmerston calls it, of sympathies or of antipathies, as the case might be. She fears collisions between border communities, living up to an imaginary line on both sides of it. She more, and more rationally, perhaps, fears friendships, communication, proselytism, sympathy—the animal magnetism of turbulent and enterprising liberty. Probably, had she ever acquired the whole territory in dispute, she would have held large tracts of it ungranted, unpeopled—a wall of wilderness against the spirit of change.

Now, however desirable it may be to her, or undesirable to us, to keep these two communities a good safe quarantine distance apart, it signifies, obviously, not one straw, whether she or we own this strip of good-for-nothing hill and bog. Whoever owns it, the two races will be exactly the same distance apart. There would not be one solitary patriot or sympathizer on the whole of it; if our title went to the desolate crest of the mountain range itself, as the King of Holland defined it. Your propagandist of liberty affects not blighted firs, cold mountains, declining into beds of luxuriant moss, which clothe, imperfectly, silicious rock and slate!

Let me say, sir, that I should feel it to be no very grievous thing if a non-conductor border, such as England has contemplated, were interposed between her people and our own. I dread the collisions of so long a line of actual contact. Looking to the mere interests of my own country, too, I am perfectly content that the provinces of British America should continue subject to the Crown of England. The near neighborhood of the possessions, the troops, the navy, the armed image of a European monarchy, bodes no sort of evil or of danger to you. Better, perhaps, if we were encircled and compressed by the "iron quality" of Austria, or the impassive ice of Russia! It would hold us fast together. It would make our nationality more intense and more concentrated. Our liberty would be more dear and more distinctive. The sentiment of union, the sentiment of American brotherhood, would be more profoundly graven in our hearts. We should love our home better, and dwell in it more contentedly, because it would be seen and felt to be the only home of freedom within our reach. But, however all this may be, it is of no sort of importance which Government owns this strip of uninhabitable land.

The only remaining question is, Whether, for any military uses, it possesses any value? Is it desirable that we should own it for the purpose of defence or of aggression against Lower Canada?

Well, sir, upon this question I seek for the opinions of military men. It involves a point of military science. It turns altogether upon inquiries with which it is their business to be conversant; upon which they are competent to judge; upon which their determinations are necessarily quite authoritative. And I do but repeat—what every Senator perfectly well knows—when I say that, in the judgment of the entire military profession of the country, this range of land has no military importance or use whatsoever. Neither Government would fortify it in time of peace. No troops would be marched across it in time of war. The title to it, therefore, and the possession of it, in time of peace, are objects of not the slightest value to either party.

But let me open this plain matter a little more largely. It is known to you, sir, that, in the summer of 1838, a military reconnoissance of the frontier of Maine was made by General Wool, and by Major Graham, of the corps of topographical engineers. The results of it are contained in reports made in December of the same year to the Senate, and which are in the hands of Senators. In 1840, a board of officers were assembled by the Secretary of War, and directed, after full and careful examination of the subject, to present a connected plan of defence for the maritime and inland frontiers of the United States. You have their report also, embodying such a plan. In addition to this, a board of commissioners, consisting of three officers of much distinction, (Messrs. Graham, Talcott, and Renwick,) under the direction of Major Graham, in 1840, 1841, and 1842, made a complete survey of the territory in dispute, one of the fruits of which is the new and beautiful map which I have by me, and which I invite Senators to examine. In all these ways there has been collected a body of military opinion on this subject, which leaves nothing to be desired.

And this opinion is decided and uniform. A glance at the map at once explains and confirms it. There are two paths, and two only, communicating between the St. Lawrence on the one side, and the valleys of the Penobscot and Kennebec, and the waters of the Bay of Fundy, on the other. One of these is the old road, from the St. Lawrence up the Chaudiere, to the waters of the Kennebec; and thence to the beautiful and peopled valley of that river, and to that of the Penobscot, the track of the memorable march of Arnold and Montgomery. All this road is many miles west of the point where the line of the Dutch award and the line of this treaty begin again to coincide; and, so far as this road is concerned, the possession and title of the strip of land under consideration are confessedly of no importance. The other is the English road up the St. John, and across, north of the line settled by the Dutch award and by this treaty, to the St. Lawrence, and up the St. Lawrence to Quebec. The space between these paths, of which this strip of land is part, is one great trackless wilderness. No army, coming from Canada, or invading Canada, would set foot on it. Why should an English General, deserting the old and open road—by the Chaudiere, for example, which leads at once to the heart of Maine—march across these highlands; place their inaccessible crest and faithless morasses behind him, to cut off his own retreat, if retreat became necessary; enter a vast forest, offering him not one inch of road, nor one single article of supply, nor one single friendly guide—all on fire with the blaze of the musketry of the militia of Maine, to arrive at last, if he lived to get through—nowhere! upon a poor, extended, and scarcely inhabited frontier, where he could win neither booty nor honor? Why, it would be the Alps without Italy! The absurdity of such a thing is inconceivable. And, on the other hand, if you were aiming a blow at Quebec, would you seek the St. Lawrence across this pathless wild at a point below Quebec? No, sir. If you felt yourselves strong enough for such achievement, you would march at once upon one or the other of the old roads of war—up the Chaudiere, in the footsteps of Mongomery; or across the Champlain, furrowed by the keels of invading fleets before.

On this point the judgments of military men, as I have said, are unanimous. Gen. Wool, in one of the reports to which I have alluded, after recommending a fortification on the road of the Chaudiere, observes:

"This position is a commanding one, and would be highly important if, by any circumstance, England should be induced to invade Maine from the direction of Quebec or Lower Canada. It is situated on the only route by which a military force would attempt to penetrate the country from Lower Canada. Any other route would be attended with almost insurmountable difficulties, and which could not fail to retard the advance of an army. On either side of the Canada road, for nearly or quite forty miles south of the line, the country is unsettled, and covered with a dense forest, through which roads must be cut and made, streams bridged, and boats built, and where neither forage, provisions, nor any other supplies could be obtained. If England, however, should make war upon the United States,—in order to secure the possession of the disputed territory in question, she would not waste her resources by contending for it in the wilds or dense forests of Maine. Having an army and a navy at her disposal, she would endeavor to compel the United States to a cession of it by the destruction of our commerce, navy depots, commercial cities, and frontier towns. These, with the present disposition of the military establishment of the country, constitute our vulnerable points, and of which England would not fail to take advantage. She would neither send her armies into our forests, nor into the heart of the country, from whence it is not probable they would return."

Such I know to be Major Graham's opinion upon a still more thorough study of the subject. Such I believe to be the opinion of every military man in the United States.

If we had this strip of mountain and bog for a thousand years of peace or war, we should never fortify it, or any part of it. In another of the reports to which I have referred, the board appointed to report a plan of defence for this very frontier say:

"It is altogether inland until it reaches the St. Croix, where the principles that have been applied to other portions of the frontier similarly situated will again become applicable. Running on a parallel of latitude to the Connecticut river, and thence along a chain of highlands, not yet clearly defined, to the Province of New Brunswick, the board are not aware that there are any points immediately on the frontier sufficiently commanding, of themselves, to call for the establishment and maintenance of fortifications, or works of defence.

"Should it ever become necessary to sustain, by force, our title to the territory now in dispute, it must be done not by isolated forts along the frontier, commanding, probably, nothing beyond the range of their own guns."

The good sense of this opinion is too obvious to need enforcement. If no army is to cross this section of the line, why fortify it? If an army chose to cross it, what would one fort avail? Would you build, then, a chain of forts, one hundred and ten miles long? A hundred and ten dogs, baying the moon, would be more sensibly occupied. But if you would not fortify this wilderness (as you know you would not) in time of peace, why desire to own it in time of peace? If, as a physical barrier of impediments and defence, it has any value, it has it whoever is the owner. If, in time of war, you have occasion to strengthen the barriers, send the militia of Maine to guard it. That they can do, and will do, whether the line of treaty run along the crest, or ten miles east or west of it.

I submit, then, sir, that the concession of this narrow range to England, beyond the line of the King of the Netherlands' award, is a totally unimportant one. I apprehend that, if her negotiator or Government ascribed any importance to it, it arose from certain European ideas, which more knowledge of the facts would have taught them were wholly inapplicable. They seem to have imagined that we should occupy and cultivate up to the very summit of the highland, and they had a dread of this proximity. We, who know that human life cannot be maintained there, and that it is doomed forever to be a desert, may well purchase the spacious thoroughfare of the St. John, and the key to Burlington, to Albany, and New York, at such a price at this.

Pass now, Mr. President, towards the other end of the line of boundary established by the treaty. You are now west of Lake Superior, and are still advancing westward, from its vast expanse of crystal waters, along narrow lakes and rapid rivers, and over portages, towards the Rainy Lake and the Lake of the Woods. And here the honorable Senator arraigns the treaty in two distinct particulars. I propose to subject each of them to a distinct examination. In the first place, he says that it deserts and abandons the true line of boundary established by the treaty of 1783, and establishes a new one further south. To understand this, I must turn to the treaty of 1783, and to a map of the country. The second article of that treaty then declares that the boundary line from Lake Superior westward, shall begin at the Long Lake on Lake Superior, and shall run thence, "through the middle of said Long Lake and the water communication between it and the Lake of the Woods, to the Lake of the Woods." Now, the estuary of what on our maps is called Pigeon river is admitted by the Senator to be the Long Lake of the treaty of 1783. He admits, therefore, that the line is to leave Lake Superior at the mouth of Pigeon river, and to ascend through the middle of that river. And so it does. But the difficulty is, that, after advancing some miles westward of Lake Superior, you find two distinct "water communications," both extending westward, but one of them turning northwesterly, the other more southwesterly, diverging to a very considerable distance apart, and not uniting again until you arrive at Lake La Croix. They enclose between them an unhappy waste of rock and water, called Hunter's Island. They are much alike in their general character, being both of them a line of narrow lakes and streams, cataracts and rapids almost without number, which are overcome by as many portages. Now, the treaty of Washington, after arriving at the point of divergence, adopts the southern water communication; and draws the line along that, till it again arrives at the point of union. The honorable Senator alleges that the northern is the water communication intended by the treaty of 1783, and that the new treaty, of course, surrenders the true line.

Well now, sir, how will you determine which of the two is the water communication meant by the treaty of 1783? That treaty draws the line "along the water communication." But here are two. Which is the right one?

I should have supposed, in the first place, that if, in 1783, one of these routes was in actual use as a mode of water communication, and the other was not, the one in use was the one intended. The language looks, or seems to look, towards the fact of actual travel. It seems to designate not so much a geographical locality as a human use. It is not land and water, but communication; that particular line of land and water over which communication is taking place. And so the honor-ble Senator would seem to have at first understood it; for, in his speech delivered in executive session against the treaty, he describes this northern route as "a communication which the Indians had followed beyond the reach of tradition, which was the highway of nations, which all travellers and traders have followed since its existence became known to our first discoverers."

Assuming, then, for the first aspect of the argument, that the water communication in use in 1783 was the one meant by the treaty,—which one was in use? This is a question of fact. It depends on the proofs. What say they?

In the first place, the honorable Senator produces not one tittle of evidence to show that his northern route from the mouth of Pigeon river was ever used at all. None, none. Let him name the book, the traveller, the tradition, which says it was He has not; he cannot. And now, when you consider with how precious hatred he hates the treaty, his habits of laborious research, his extensive and minute acquaintance with the whole subject, and his ample means in his own library and maps, and those of Congress, of arriving at the truth—this non-production of evidence must be held conclusive against his position. If it had existed, we should have had it. The crystal waves of Lake Superior would have given up the dead to testify if they had known the fact. But I am able to put this matter at rest forever. Sir, it is susceptible of the most ample and most precise demonstration—first, that, while France possessed the Canadas, her traders did not ascend from the mouth of Pigeon river, and pursue either of these routes; but set out from the river Kamanastiquia, forty or fifty miles northeast of Pigeon river, on Lake Superior, and thence proceeded westwardly: second, that, after the conquest of Canada, the English traders universally ascended from the mouth of Pigeon river, and through it, or rather through the portage a little south of it; thence up and along the southernmost of these routes, (never along the northernmost;) and continued to do so from 1760 down to 1803.

In 1783, therefore, the northern route was not used, and never had been; while the southern had been used from the moment the English knew anything of the country at all. The only water communication of these two, ever used by a human being, was the one adopted by this treaty. I shall do no more, sir, than to refer to the sources of proof. They are ample; they are direct; they are wholly uncontradicted. I find the evidence, then, first, in the executive document No. 451, 2d session of the 25th Congress, containing the proceedings of the commissioners appointed under the 7th article of the treaty of Ghent to determine the boundaries of the United States and the British possessions in North America. You know the history and the value of this document. Messrs. Porter and Barclay were commissioners appointed by the two Governments, respectively, under the 6th and 7th articles of the treaty of Ghent. They were to fix the boundary from the foot of Neebish Rapids to the northwesternmost point of the Lake of the Woods. General Porter was the American commissioner, Mr. Barclay the English. They were employed in this service for a long time. They agreed to some extent, and to some extent they differed. The line westward from Lake Superior to the Rainy Lake they were unable to agree on, and left it undermined. The document to which I am about to refer, contains a complete report of the proceedings of the commissioners, with a great body of evidence relied upon by one or the other, or both, in support of their views respectively. Mr. Forsyth, the Secretary of State, in his communication transmitting it to Congress, declares "that it is all the information on the subject on the files of the department."

Looking into this authentic collection of evidence, then, I refer first to the testimony of William McGillivray. Who he was, General Porter informs you on page 22 of this document. He describes him as a "very respectable and intelligent British subject, particularly and personally conversant with the geography of the interior, and (at the time of writing the above-mentioned letters was, probably,) the best living authority on this subject." Now, what does he testify upon the subject of the uses of these two routes? On page 122 he particularly traces out the southern route from the mouth of Pigeon river, or rather the portage a little south of it; and then adds: "By this route, and this route only, was the trade to the northwest country carried on by the French, while in possession of Canada, and from the conquest until the year 1803 by the English traders."

In the next place, Sir Alexander Mackenzie, in his account of the fur-trade prefixed to his Travels, describes this southern route as the established and only track of the English traders and travellers. He traces their journey step by step, from Montreal to Lake Superior, and from Lake Superior to the Rainy Lake, by the precise course pursued by this treaty; and declares that it had been the settled line of communication from a very short period after the conquest of Canada. I invite the honorable Senator, as I read this writer's enumeration of the lakes along which the fur-trade is described as travelling, to follow me upon the map, and say whether they are not the lakes comprising the southern line of communication. There is, of course, no question about it.

In the next place, I employ the testimony of Mr. Delafield, who was the agent of the American commissioner, General Porter, during the sittings of the commission of which I have spoken, and who contributed, I perceive, an able argument in support of some part of the American claim. I find him on pages 25 and 26 of the document to which I have before referred, describing this southern communication as "the old track of the traders," as "the known route," as "one well-known and continuous chain of waters." This gentleman assisted in surveying it thrice, and in making a map of it.

To this I add the statement of Mr. Ferguson, who was the principal American surveyor attending that commission—a gentleman of great talent and science, now employed upon the coast survey. In his letter to Mr. Webster of July 25, 1842, (which is among the papers accompanying the treaty,) he speaks of the treaty as pursuing, generally, the "old commercial route." And in one addressed to me, and which I hold in my hand, dated January 19, 1843, he uses these words: "The route now described as the boundary was the one used always by the British fur-traders, when they were in possession of the country including both."

I present to the Senate, then, sir, the testimony of Mr. McGillivray, whom our distinguished and able commissioner, General Porter, declares to be "respectable, intelligent, and the best living witness on the subject"—of Sir Alexander Mackenzie, relating facts, the truth or falsehood of which was known to all British America, and without a motive to relate untruly—and of Mr. Delafield, our own agent, and Mr. Ferguson, our own surveyor on the commission; who all concur in declaring, for substance, that, from the conquest of Canada by England—that is, for more than twenty years before the treaty of 1783—the only communication from Lake Superior westward was exactly this southern communication adopted by the treaty of 1842, and that it continued the only one down to 1803. And against this accumulation of proof, the honorable Senator has never produced a particle of contradictory proof.

If, then, sir, when the treaty of 1783 runs the line through "the water communication" from the mouth of Pigeon river, it means that one water communication then existing and used, and which had existed and been used ever since England had owned the country: if it means the only one which, from the mouth of Pigeon river, had ever been used, so far as we can learn, by a human being—then it means the one adopted by the treaty of 1842. On this point there is no room for doubt or disputation.

2. But suppose it be said that the treaty of 1783 means the best water communication—that having the most continuous line of deep water, the fewest cataracts, the fewest rapids: the most practicable and navigable line.

Well, sir, even so: the honorable Senator offers no evidence at all that the northern route is best. None. He assails the treaty. He assails the making and the ratifying. He assumes the burden of proof; and he offers not a particle of evidence, good or bad.

But look to the proof on the other side. In the first place, is it not an irresistible inference from the fact that the southern route alone was used, that it was the best? If the northern was the easiest, safest, and shortest, is it not inconceivable that neither French, nor English, nor Canadian enterprise, nor the unerring instincts and immemorial traditions of the red race, ever found it out? Why, sir, the difference of one cataract or one carrying-place in its favor, would have drawn to it, with unfailing certainty, the universal travel of all the hunters and traders of all these races.

But again, sir. Mr. Barclay, the British commissioner, on page 92 of the document I have used so much, employs this language:

"The course described by the undersigned is, throughout, the old commercial route, and the route invariably used by the traders, who enter or return by the Grand Portage and Pigeon river. But the water communication from Lake Kasagenega, by Sturgeon river to the Sturgeon lake, and the deviation by the Arrow river and Arrow lake, from the main route, are difficult, and but little known."

And again:

"In fact, it is too notorious to require proof, among persons in the least acquainted with these waters, that neither the Arrow river nor the Sturgeon river is an accustomed route: the reason assigned is, that they are both more devious, and both attended with greater obstacles, than is the common route."

I know he is the English commissioner; but I also know that neither our own commissioner, nor anybody else, anywhere, intimates one word to the contrary.

3. Upon this point, however, the evidence of Mr. Ferguson is the most satisfactory. In his letter to me, from which I have already read an extract, he says:

"2d. The portages on the southern route are shorter (in this I depend entirely on my recollection) than those on the northern.

"3d. On the northern route there are several cataracts, or falls, varying in height from 20 to 60 feet—rendering, for commercial purposes, the navigation more uncertain and dangerous.

"4th. There is no question but that the route as designated in the treaty of 1842, was intended by the treaty of 1783—the ignorance of the geography of the country only producing the ambiguities."

In another letter, also addressed to me, under date of January 21, 1843, he favors me with a list of the falls and rapids in the route north of Hunter's island, and between the points where it departs from and unites to the southern route. He makes, in all, between those points, about forty falls and rapids, from two feet to thirty-five feet; and says that some of them are "especially dangerous." The name of the Riviere Maligne—which forms part of this delightful northern communication—he adds, indicates its character. You see, then, sir, that forty portages, at least, are required to overcome the impracticabilities of this unheard-of and untravelled path; while nobody pretends that you find that number upon the line of this treaty.

I understand the honorable Senator to have intimated that there is still another criterion to determine the "water communication" intended by the treaty of 1783. He says it may mean that one a ong which you find the most continuous line of water of some sort—deep or shallow, rapid or quiet, straight or crooked—the fewest places where the water is completely severed and interrupted by dry land. Even so, sir, the honorable Senator has not proved, or sought to prove, that the northern has an advantage over the southern. If he cites Mackenzie for the purpose, I can only say that I am not aware, after a recent and diligent reading of his book, of one word in it, from beginning to end, which has the least application to such a question.

The honorable Senator then relies at last, and he relies exclusively, on two maps of our countryman, Tanner; one published in 1838, I believe, and the other in 1841, or 1840 or '42. These maps patriotically and intrepidly draw the line of boundary north of Hunter's island. But surely, surely we must admit that, as evidence on the matters of fact upon which the interpretation of the treaty of 1783 depends, this amounts to nothing. The truth is, that the question of this debate, which water communication is meant by the treaty of 1783, remains exactly where it was in 1783. Nothing has been said or done by either Government to aid in determining it. No line has been run out—no monument erected—no possession taken and maintained, and acquiesced in, which changes the aspect of the case in the slightest degree;—nothing which helps to construe the treaty of 1783, and to apply it to the ground; or which supersedes the necessity of construing and applying it exactly as if it were made twelve months ago. It is altogether an open question. It was so, I should rather say, up to the time when the treaty of Washington was concluded. To determine it, there is no other mode than to go out with the writing itself upon the desert localities; ascertain their character; see what had been the direction of the hunter's path across them; and thus, by an application of the treaty to its subject, deduce its meaning. Of course, then, a map made in either country, in 1838 or 1840, affords no useful evidence of anything material to the investigation. I cannot collect from this splendid one of Tanner, suspended to the view of the Senate, whether he supposed the northern route was the one used in 1783; or whether he supposed it was the best one; or what he knew, or how he knew anything, one way or the other, upon these matters of fact. Yet, upon those matters of fact depends the whole question at this day. Of what value, then, is the evidence? No doubt, since the commission of Messrs. Porter and Barclay at least, the existence of the two water communications has been known; no doubt, since that time, it has been known that there was or might grow up a controversy about them; and, no doubt, a patriotic American geographer very judiciously and very naturally decided the controversy in advance in favor of his patrons and his country. I approve his patriotism, and distrust his map.

The honorable Senator interrupts me to say that he has forty other maps which draw the same line north of Hunter's island. Sir, if he means (as I take it for granted he means) those little plates which are appended to the document to which I have so often referred, I beg to say that, valueless for many reasons, they must be admitted by himself to be so, for this conclusive reason: that they all of them lay down the Long Lake not at the mouth of Pigeon river, where the Senator agrees that it is, but forty or fifty miles farther northeast. It is for this that Mr. Delafield cites and argues from them. They come into court, then, each and all, with an acknowledged and enormous falsehood upon their fronts, and are utterly discredited accordingly.

Since, sir, however, the honorable Senator has cited a map of 1838, and one of 1840, and has made allusion (if I have rightly understood him) to other and earlier maps, whose palpable and admitted errors utterly annihilate their testimony, I will take leave to call the attention of the Senate to one of a very different character. I have here an original Mitchell's map. This map, the Senate know, the commissioners who negotiated the treaty of 1783 had before them during the negotiation. I do not mean, of course, that they had this identical map, but one of the same impression, and exactly like it. And, sir, without wishing to press any inference from it too far, I cannot but think that it proves that the geographer intended to lay down one water communication from the mouth of what we now call Pigeon river, westward; and to lay down that one which runs south of Hunter's island. Senators may see here, first, that this map places Long Lake at the mouth of Pigeon river; in truth, it is this fact which induced our commissioner, Gen Porter, to believe that the estuary of Pigeon river is the Long Lake of the treaty of 1783; second, from this point, (which we now agree to call Pigeon river,) it extends one water communication, and one only, to the Lake of the Woods; third, and the course of this communication quite strikingly resembles the water communication from the mouth of Pigeon river, south of Hunter's island, on our new maps, which is adopted by the recent treaty; that is, after advancing some distance westward from Lake Superior, it inclines south, and then turns northwesterly, somewhat remarkably, like the southern and western boundary of Hunter's island.

Now, sir, if this resemblance exists, (of which Senators will judge,) it affords some presumption that the geographer intended to lay down the southern of the two lines of communication, and that he was ignorant of, or disregarded, the northern. If so, there is ground of presumption, too, that the framers of the treaty of 1783 meant to designate and adopt the same line of communication. You admit that they place Long Lake at the mouth of Pigeon river, because you find that the map which they had before them does so; why, then, do they not mean to designate the only line from Long Lake which the same map depicted, and of whose existence it made any recognition?

But, Mr. President, it is not upon these or upon any maps that I rest the question. The Senator assumes the burden of showing that the line of the treaty of 1783 is the northern of the two which we have been comparing. I controvert his position, and appeal to the proofs. And, upon these proofs, I submit that it is perfectly clear that the southern was the only one which, in 1783, had been ever used, and that it was the best of the two. I submit, further, that there is no evidence that the existence of the northern was at that time known or suspected; and there is no evidence that, upon any criterion whatever for determining which the treaty of 1783 intended, however capricious or however favorable to the position of the honorable Senator, the northern presents the slightest ground of preference over the other.

I deny, then, that the treaty has made the change of a hair's breadth in the line beyond Lake Superior. It has sought for the line of 1783, and has found it. Not an acre of that "wide waste of rock and water;" not a mile of the old fur-hunter's path; not a cataract; not a portage, intended for you by the treaty of peace, is given away, with or without compensation. On the contrary, it is certain that a claim to four millions of acres south of the line now finally established, on which England has steadily insisted, is surrendered forever.

The other objection of the honorable Senator to that part of the treaty which applies to the country west of Superior, is totally a distinct objection, requiring to be distinctly examined. It is this: that even if the line of boundary is rightly drawn, and in those places where it is confessedly rightly drawn, the treaty admits the subjects of Great Britain to a use in common with our own citizens, of all the customary portages along the line; and, among these, of the Grand Portage, a few miles south of the mouth of Pigeon river. And this objection, sir, is true in point of fact. The second article of the treaty draws a line of boundary through the middle of Pigeon river, thence through the middle of the entire succession of water communications south of Hunter's island, and so to the Rainy Lake; and then concludes: "It being understood that all the water communications, and all the usual portages along the line from Lake Superior to the Lake of the Woods, and also Grand Portage, from the shore of Lake Superior to the Pigeon river, as now actually used, shall be free and open to the use of the citizens and subjects of both countries."

But while I admit it to be true in point of fact, the honorable Senator must allow me to say that it is totally undeserving of his notice as a serious objection to the treaty. The question of boundary was worthy of him. If he could have established that branch of his arraignment, it would have been a thing to boast of. But this, sir, is certainly beneath the Senator's mark. And I think I am justified in saying so, by the course of the Senator himself. Why, sir, when did he first hold it worth his while to break these butterfly portages upon his wheel? It is only within the last week or fortnight, according to my recollection, that he ever alluded to them. How strenuously, and with what ability he fought the treaty in executive session, through one summer's day after another, we all know. His speech upon that occasion he has since written out and given to the country. Here it is—twenty-seven pages—not much short of eighty columns of the Congressional Globe; the most elaborate, the most minute, the most searching, the most hostile examination, dissection, and mastication of a treaty in the whole history of debate. Yet, in all that speech, (and I have navigated its whole vast atlantic, and sounded all its depths,) there is not one word about these portages—not one. He enumerates twelve distinct concessions which the treaty makes to England. He dwells on their value and importance, one by one, drop by drop. Nothing seems to escape him; yet a silence as of the grave about all, and all manner of portages, grand or little! Certainly—certainly this must have been a pretty inconsiderable objection, when so powerful a microscope in the hand of such an operator did not then detect it.

And so it is, when you come to examine it. Why, sir, the treaty attempts merely a liberal, manly, cypres execution of the treaty of 1783. The framers of that celebrated arrangement describe, and mean to divide and give in equal shares, a water communication from Lake Superior to the Lake of the Woods. When the localities come to be inspected, it is found that there is a geographical or physical water line; and that there is a line of actual travel which must and does depart from the other, here and there, by portages. A liberal approximated execution of that treaty would seem to require that the line of boundary should follow the water line; and that the portages, indispensable to the enjoyment of that line as a mode of communication, should be shared in common. This is what the present treaty does, apparently, with the original approbation of the honorable Senator himself, and still, I hope, with the approbation of all mankind beside.

The honorable Senator alleges that the treaty, in this behalf, makes a concession to England which Jay, in 1794, refused to make; and that it brings back the bloody throngs of British traders to the portage south of Pigeon river, from which Jay's treaty compelled them to migrate in 1803, and to which they have been languishing to return ever since. And thereupon he exclaims: "Give me the Federalists of 1794; give me George Washington and his friends—men who had American hearts in their bosoms—for all the Federalists now alive! I stand by the work of John Jay!"

Mr. President, I have no difficulty in supposing the honorable Senator perfectly sincere in this eulogy of the departed great. I will not say that his purpose seemed more to depreciate others than to praise them. I will not say that "he unplumbs the dead for bullets to assassinate the living." I unite with him especially in the honors he has paused to bestow upon the grave of Jay. I rejoice to see that great man, the friend of Washington and of kindred virtues, pure, elevated, and refined, his whole character whiter than the ermine of his exalted office, receive the justice which, living, he was denied. The malignant slander of the hour is shamed to rest, and thousands of the generation who heard him accused of selling the interests and glory of America for English gold or praise, have lived to see the whole world assign him his seat among the rarer and grander names, who in peace and war have sought to serve, not sought to please, their country. What more striking—what more grateful—what more full of lessons of constancy and steadfastness in the moment of averted popular favor, than to hear that treaty for which Washington could scarcely obtain a hearing, now and here produced as the standard by which the merit of modern negotiation is to be tried!

Let the provisions, then, of this treaty of 1842, which we have now to consider, be tried by the provisions upon the same subject in the treaty of 1794. Sir, they are the same exactly! I say to the honorable Senator, that there is no concession made in this, upon the subject of portages, that is not made in that. I say to him that this is a reproduction and re-establishment of that in this behalf—neither less nor more. The right of transit, the common use of the water communications and of the auxiliary carrying-places, the inducements to travel the old route in the old modes, are exactly the same under one as the other; and there is no more propriety in the reiterated asseveration of the honorable Senator that the framer of this treaty has led back the British traders from Kamanastiquia to south of Pigeon river, than there would be in saying as often and as loudly that John Jay offered them a tempting bribe to induce them not to remove northward of the river at all. Turn, sir, to Jay's treaty, and judge for yourself. I select and read all the parts of it which apply to the question:

"Art. 3. It is agreed that it shall at all times be free to his Majesty's subjects and to the citizens of the United States, and also to the Indians dwelling on either side of the said boundary line, freely to pass and repass, by land or inland navigation, into the respective territories and countries of the two parties, on the continent of America, (the country within the limits of the Hudson's Bay Company only excepted,) and to navigate all the lakes, rivers, and waters thereof, and freely to carry on trade and commerce with each other."

"No duty of entry shall ever be levied by either party on peltries brought by land, or inland navigation, into the said territories respectively; nor shall the Indians passing or repassing with their own proper goods and effects, of whatever nature, pay for the same any impost or duty whatever. But goods in bales, or other large packages, unusual among Indians, shall not be considered as goods belonging bona fide to Indians."

"No higher or other tolls or rates of ferriage than what are or shall be payable by natives, shall be demanded on either side; and no duties shall be payable on any goods which shall merely be carried over any of the portages or carrying-places on either side, for the purpose of being immediately reimbarked and carried to some other place or places. But as by this stipulation it is only meant to secure to each party a free passage across the portages on both sides, it is agreed that this exemption from duty shall extend only to such goods as are carried in the usual and direct road across the portage, and are not attempted to be in any manner sold or exchanged during their passage across the same; and proper regulations may be established to prevent the possibility of any frauds in this respect."

"As this article is intended to render, in a great degree, the local advantages of each party common to both, and thereby to promote a disposition favorable to friendship and good neighborhood, it is agreed that the respective Governments will mutually promote this amicable intercourse, by causing speedy and impartial justice to be done, and necessary protection to be extended, to all who may be concerned therein."

Now, sir, the first thing I have to say is, that this expressly, in the plainest words and for the strongest reasons, gives to both nations the free and common use of all existing portages.

"No duties shall be payable on any goods which shall merely be carried over any of the portages or carrying-places on either side, for the purpose of being immediately re-embarked and carried to some other place or places. But, as by this stipulation it is only meant to secure to each party a free passage across the portages on both sides, it is agreed," &c.

Yes, sir, it makes all of them—the Grand Portage and all—free, open, and common to both nations, and to all of both. It does so for reasons worthy of the age and the men. While we are inflaming ourselves about the ambition of England, and the cruelty and rapacity of her traders; while we sit and listen to denunciations of the negotiator of the new treaty for allowing those traders to row their canoes up the same rapid, and carry them on their backs over the same portage, with our own, as if the liberties of America were sold, just listen to that strain of higher mood, in which the grand and manly reasons are assigned in Jay's treaty for this self-same thing:

"As this article is intended to render, in a great degree, the local advantages of each party common to both, and thereby to promote a disposition favorable to friendship and good neighborhood, it is agreed," &c.

You see, therefore, sir, that if it is a crime or a blunder to open these portages, it is no new one. The treaty by which the honorable Senator tries this treaty, had opened them before; it had opened them all; it had opened the Grand Portage, six miles south of Pigeon river, just as much and as widely as it opened all the rest. It opens "all on both sides," in so many words; and it opened that, or it opened not one.

The next remark I make on this subject is, that Jay's treaty expressly declares that no duties shall be exacted for the mere transit of goods across these portages. If they are brought within our territory for sale—if the right of portage is sought to be converted into a right to open a market and set up a shop, and thus to sell within American territory, instead of transporting across it, then duties are to be paid. But the right of portage, direct and bona fide, is free, and embarrassed by no duty.

Just so it is, and subject to just the same limitations, in the new treaty Portages it makes free and open. Goods, therefore, which are carried across these portages, in the usual manner, and in good faith, will be subject to no transit duty. But goods brought into American territory to sell; goods which shall be arrested and taken out of direct and fair transit across, and exposed for sale, will be subject to duty at the pleasure of Congress. Nothing is made free but the right to carry across. He who, under color of using that privilege, exerts another, puts himself out of the exemption of the treaty.

If, then, sir, it is a crime, or blunder, to allow the Canadian trader to carry merchandise to the great northwest beyond the line of our extreme boundary, and bring furs back, free of transit duty, John Jay set the example of it. He did not think it worth while to harass such enterprise as that by duties on blankets, and gunpowder, and rum, and hominy, and wildcat skins! Following the example of all civilization, he thought "dispositions favorable to friendship and good neighborhood" cheaply purchased by such courtesy as this. Even if the portages had all been on the American side of the line, as they were not—for this, after all, is only a right of free transit given to England for a right of free transit given by her—he would have disdained exactions so unproductive, so vexatious, so universally discountenanced by all international decencies of intercourse.

Since, then, sir, the new treaty and the old, in the matter of these portages, are just alike, you may wonder, perhaps, what the honorable Senator really means when he says that the new treaty brings back the British traders whom the old one had sent away. Over and over again he has made this declaration. Long, long (says he) had these tribes languished to return to the Grand Portage; negotiation after negotiation had been tried for that purpose in vain; there they were up at Kamanistiquia and the unclassical Dog river, stretching out their arms "ulterioris ripæ amore," when the American Secretary put himself at their head—a Moses, a Joshua, (for he makes them both,) and led them back. Now, what in the world does all this really mean? Sir, without promising to be able to tell you that, I will lay the exact facts before the Senate, and leave you to judge for yourselves.

For many years, then, before 1783, and down to 1803, the Canadian traders not only travelled across the Grand Portage and other portages on their way west from Lake Superior, but they had their general depot at the Grand Portage. They there had storehouses, dwelling-houses, and all the necessary fixtures and permanent establishments of a trading-post. Well, sir, this place was and is within the territory of the United States. The middle of Pigeon river is the boundary line—for several miles, at least—up from its mouth, by the treaty of 1783, by the treaty of 1842, and by the concession of the honorable Senator from Missouri; and this place was and is six miles south of that line. In 1803, (probably some time before,) a rumor reached that post that the American collector of customs at Michilimackinac intended to levy duties upon all the merchandise and property there, upon the ground that they were within the United States; and thereupon the traders broke up and abandoned the depot, and established a new one at Kamanistiquia, since called Fort William, fifty miles northeast from the Grand Portage. There it has been ever since.

And now, sir, I deny that Jay's treaty caused the removal of this depot to Fort William, or that the new treaty will bring it back to the Grand Portage. The rights and the liabilities of these traders under the two treaties are identically the same. They have had no Pharoah, and have found no Moses. Why, sir, does the honorable Senator say that, under the new treaty, they can come back to the Grand Portage, re-establish their depot, build shops and houses, store their goods, and buy and sell as they did before 1803? Certainly not; for the treaty expressly declares a line of boundary which brings that portage within the United States; and it secures these British subjects no right whatever in it, but to use it as a carrying-place for the direct mere transportation of things over in good faith—a naked, strict right of way. What, then, can they do under this treaty, does he say? Why, they can build their depot on the north bank of Pigeon river, near its mouth, opposite the Grand Portage; and thence they can travel across the Grand Portage, and all the other portages, to the Lake of the Woods. Very well; be it so. Could they not have done the same thing under Jay's treaty? Exactly, exactly. Was not the Pigeon river the true boundary for at least several miles from its mouth in 1794? Why, the honorable Senator admits it. It is the true boundary, he admits, established by the treaty of 1783; and it has been the true boundary ever since. Then, sir, the next day after the treaty of 1783 was made—the next day after Jay's treaty was made, and at any and every moment from that time to this, these traders could have built their depot on the north side of Pigeon river, and travelled to their hearts' content over grand portages and little ones, to the tune of the Canadian boat-song, to the Lake of the Woods. And that is everything they can do by the new treaty! And yet the Secretary of State is said to have realized the achievements and blended the separate fame of Moses and Joshua, by leading back the British traders whom Jay had driven out.

It is true, undoubtedly, that the new treaty for the first time expressly ascertains Pigeon river to be the boundary. It for the first time enables all parties on both sides to make all their arrangements upon, and with a certain knowledge of, that important fact. It puts an end to the long and harassing doubt whether the Dog lake, the Pigeon river, or the Fond du Lac, is the point on Lake Superior from which the line should set out westward. In that sense, and to that extent, it apprizes British and American traders of their exact rights and exact privileges, and allows them to govern themselves accordingly. In that sense, and to that extent, it enables them to do what they could not prudently do before. But does the honorable Senator only mean, then, to complain that an important unsettled line has been settled, and to this extent settled rightly? To that it comes at last, and to nothing else.

I regret, sir, that the attention of the Senate has been withdrawn so long from the consideration of the bill for the occupation of the Oregon, (which is the subject properly before you,) by any merely collateral matter, however important. But it was the honorable Senator from Missouri who first turned aside from the defence of the bill to attack the treaty of 1842. Approving with my whole heart and whole reason that great arrangement of peace and of honor, I do not conceive that I am in fault for losing sight of the bill upon your table to follow him. I only hope the episode may not bear a too disproportionate relation to the main performance. And yet, why is a discussion of the treaty which you have just concluded irrevelant to the immediate question before you? If that treaty has been believed, by the thoughtful and good of both countries, to go far and do much to restore and confirm the kind regards of the two great branches of the English name and blood—if it has composed one of their more exasperating and inveterate differences—if it has sweetened their temper and smoothed their brow—if, in the mode of entering on and continuing that negotiation, England has been observed to abate somewhat of her pride and of her distance, and to be willing to meet frankly and half-way, in confidence and in honor, her daughter, her rival, so emulous of her own glory, so proud of her own lettered and martial fame—if the result of a negotiation so begun, so conducted, may fairly be reckoned among the triumphs of reason and of civilization, a victory of peace, a tribute to the duty of peace,—how solicitous should we be not now, by the thoughtless act of a moment, to undo all that it has done; to disappoint all that it has promised! How solicitous, especially, to do nothing which, while it endangers our territory, shall sully our honor!

SPEECH OF MR. MOREHEAD,

OF KENTUCKY.

In Senate of the United States, January 23, 1843.—On the Oregon bill.

Mr. MOREHEAD said that he had, a few days since, submitted to the Senate a resolution calling upon the Executive for information as to certain alleged acts of the British Government, by which it has exerted an exclusive jurisdiction over the Oregon Territory. The official answer to that call was conveyed in the communication which had just been read to the Senate.

[The communication itself was, in effect, as follows: The Secretary of State says that a letter from Thomas J. Farnham, dated 4th January, 1840, appears to have been transmitted to that department, by the Secretary of War, in the month of May following; and that, on the 6th of the same month, a letter was transmitted to the American minister in London, with extracts from that communication. As the President was desirous of knowing whether the intelligence contained in Mr. Farnham's letter relative to large grants, by the British Government to the Hudson Bay Company, of a large and valuable tract of land in the Oregon Territory, and of supposed grants and sales of those lands by that company to individuals, was well founded, the minister was instructed to make application to the proper quarter for information on the subject. In presenting the matter to the British Government, he was assured that no such grant of land had been made to the Hudson Bay Company; and that the only grant which had been made to that company was a grant of exclusive trade with the Indians in certain parts of North America for a further term of twenty-one years, on the surrender of the former grant.]

Mr. M. proceeded to say that his object, in the call which he had made, was to place before the Senate, for the further course of this discussion, authentic statements of fact in relation to the report so generally credited, that grants of land had been made by the British Government within the Oregon Territory. He had desired more particularly to have in the hands of the Senate the letter which accompanied the Secretary's communication—a letter to the Secretary of War, from a gentleman at its date in the Territory, and employed by the Government in an official capacity. It is of the year 1839 or 1840, and mentions as a fact—that which was then and there believed to be true—that the British Government had granted to the Hudson Bay Company a large and valuable tract of land in the neighborhood of the straits of Juan de Fuca, and within the limits of the Oregon Territory.

I learn with pleasure (said Mr. M.) the steps which were thought advisable as to calling the attention of the British Government to this allegation, and their official denial of the fact thus stated. The disavowal satisfies me that the supposed grant has not been made; but it by no means convinces me that everything but the form of such grants is not most real. The disclaimer does not alter the acts of the British Government, except as to their direct and open responsibility; nor the possession of the Hudson Bay Company, so far as all the real purposes of possession are to be accomplished. I hold the disclaimer only material as to the forms under which these things are done. Setting aside, however, that point of the allegation, I think we have abundant proofs that Great Britain, directly or indirectly, exercises exclusive jurisdiction and enjoyment of the Territory; that if she has not already dispossessed, she is rapidly and surely dispossessing us; and that she therefore completely violates the convention, in point of fact, while she respects its forms.

The words of the third article of the convention of 1818 are as follows:

"It is agreed that any country that may be claimed by either party on the northwest coast of America, westward of the Stony mountains, shall, together with its harbors, bays, and creeks, and the navigation of all rivers within the same, be free and open, for the term of ten years from the date of the signature of the present convention, to the vessels, citizens, and subjects of the two powers; it being well understood that this agreement is not to be construed to the prejudice of any claim which either of the two high contracting parties may have to any part of the said country; nor shall it be taken to affect the claims of any other power or state to any part of the said country: the only object of the high contracting parties, in that respect, being to prevent disputes and differences among themselves."

Now, sir, this is claimed and construed as a treaty of joint occupation; and that joint occupation temporary, for it is to last but ten years.

A joint and a temporary occupation would, one would say, exclude the idea of permament forts and fixed settlements—things which mark the very opposite of the only two forms of possession, permanent and temporary. Under the latter, tents may be set up, shantees erected, and cabins or other such rude and occasional shelters be built for momentary use. But the felling of forests, the construction of regular habitations, the fencing in of fields, the regular cultivation and improvement of the soil, the fitting up of saw-mills, the assemblage of workshops, and of many other of the appliances of fixed sojourn and employment, certainly denote, especially with forts to protect them, something more than transient possession, and constitute, and are meant to constitute, a lasting, and, of course, exclusive occupation of the places thus appropriated. Now, what are the proceedings of the great and permitted agent of these British infringements—the Hudson Bay Company? The report of Captain Nathaniel J. Wyeth (No. 101 Indian Affairs) shall tell you.

Here Mr. M. read to the following purport from Captain Wyeth:

"The company have now their chief establishment at Fort Vancouver, on the north side of the Columbia, about eighty miles above its mouth; for Fort George, (Astoria,) the older station, is now a mere look-out, where little trade is done.

"At Vancouver are stationed about two hundred men, usually employed in agricultural or mechanical labor. There is a saw-mill about six miles above it, which supplies lumber for themselves and for the Sandwich Islands. The fort is a stockade, with accommodations for the people employed at it, two large guns not in use, and such defences merely as are necessary against the Indians. To this point all the supplies for the fur-trade are sent, and here the returns are collected."

He proceeds to enumerate and describe the other British posts in Oregon: Wallahwallah, Okanugen, and Colville, on the Columbia; Flathead, on the river of that name; the Big Wood post, at the mouth of Big Wood; and a station not permanently occupied at the mouth of Umbiquoi.

He proceeds to relate the arts by which American competition is excluded or crushed, and the traders driven away. Their parties, he says, frequently in violation of treaties, pass within the limits of the United States on the Missouri. This was done in 1833, 1834, 1835, and 1836, contrary, it was said, to the instructions of the company, but probably with their consent.

He further says: "I have been informed that the British Government have given an assurance to the Hudson Bay Company that they will not surrender any part of the country north of the Columbia; or, if they do so, they will remunerate them for any establishments they may have made in that part of it."

He proceeds to give an account of the younger and entirely agricultural settlement of Wallumette, on the south of the Columbia, where some twenty or thirty men, formerly in the employment of the company, cultivate small farms.

He concludes as follows:

"In conclusion, I will observe, that the measures of this company have been conceived with wisdom, steadily pursued, and have been well seconded by their Government, and the success has been complete; and, without being able to charge on them any gross violations of the existing treaties, a few years will make the country west of the mountains as completely English as they can desire. Already the Americans are unknown as a nation; and, as individuals, their power is despised by the natives of the land. A population is growing out of the occupancy of the country, whose prejudices are not with us; and, before many years, they will decide to whom the country shall belong, unless, in the mean time, the American Government make their power felt and seen to a greater degree than has yet been the case."

The statements of Mr. Slacum (an agent of the Government, whose report may be found in the same body of documents and same number) are still minuter, but to the same general effect.

He gives an account of the formal surrender of Fort George (Astoria) in 1818, in conformity with the treaty of Ghent, and the ceremonies with which the British agents passed it into our hands. The fact itself goes far to mark an admission of our claim of sovereignty. The fort itself was soon after destroyed by fire, said to have been put by the Indians.

His visit marks a considerable progress of things since the time to which Mr. Wyeth's description applies. "Fort Vancouver occupies (in 1837) double the old space. There are thirty-nine buildings within, and forty-nine cabins under its walls; a large barn, with seven other buildings attached; an hospital and boat-house on the river; a saw-mill, employing twenty-eight men, and cutting above two thousand feet of timber daily, &c. The farm contains three thousand acres in cultivation, employing one hundred laborers. The whole number of persons attached to the establishment is from seven hundred and fifty to eight hundred. The farm produced in 1837 eight thousand bushels of wheat; five thousand five hundred bushels of barley; six thousand bushels of oats; nine thousand bushels of peas; fourteen thousand bushels of potatoes; and large quantities of other crops. They had a large threshing machine; a distillery; (discontinued;) a grist mill; a stock of one thousand black cattle; seven hundred hogs; two hundred sheep; near five hundred horses; and forty yoke of working oxen." [In short, it would appear to be pretty much such a farm as the famous one of old Mr. Coke, (the Earl of Leicester,) in England—an establishment about as much like a permanent settlement as his.]

I might, sir, (proceeded Mr. MOREHEAD,) multiply quotations; but these are enough to show that, under the name and cover of the Hudson Bay Company, the British Government is in actual, and regular, and exclusive possession of this territory. It is entirely under the control of that great association, at whose back the Government itself stands, whenever there is need. They have not only turned your joint possession out of doors, but systematically set savage spies upon your steps, if you wander towards your ancient tenement. They unite against you all the Indian tribes, poison their minds against you, and train them on to a murderous hostility. They have, indeed, taken, in all respects, those stealthy and irresponsible methods of guile which (skilful natives as they are) they know perfectly how to employ, when more available than force. Forbearing to alarm you by any show of strength, and to rouse you by any open contravention of the treaty, they have yet, without an effort, (husbanding their own resources, and not calling out yours,) through the commercial mechanism of a powerful and enterprising company, and its far-spreading agents and posts, accomplished, to a great extent, everything that they could wish, or we dread. They have swept the country of its rich furs, obtained a complete ascendency over its tribes, kept you off, started new modes of life more permanent than those which have failed, and, in short, got so long a start upon you in the race of possession, that you must at once exert yourself, if you would not be distanced. Are all these things to go on, until she comes to found a new title upon the very length of the wrong, and bar you forever by pleading the statute of limitations?

Nor, sir, is all this to be escaped by saying that these are the acts of the Hudson Bay Company, and not of the British Government. They are done under the sanction of that Government, and they are the surest means of achieving its purposes. They form its system of territorial encroachment almost everywhere, and especially against all nations capable of resisting direct attack. They are done by its subjects—not wandering outcasts merely, but a numerous body, organized and chartered, gifted by the Government with high privileges, and strictly accountable to it. Unquestionably, if such a body, watched over as it is by the British Government, pursues, for a series of years, measures so admirably fitted to break up our access to that country, and all that common enjoyment of it which the convention of 1818 stipulates, Britain, to whose advantage against us all these acts of her great association turn—Britain, whose surest system of encroachment and dispossession they form—Britain, who takes from that company, as its mistress and sovereign, all that it can snatch from us—Britain, I say, must be held, in effect, to do all these things, let her evasively disavow them as much as she will.

Referring to the British act of Parliament of July 2, 1821, the Senator from Massachusetts quoted its fourth section to show that it expressly refused to give any such license to trade in the Oregon Territory, to the prejudice or exclusion of any citizens of the United States who may engage in the trade there. And he cited the sixth section of the same act, to show that, in setting up there the jurisdiction of their own Canadian courts, they had expressly excepted such places as were within any civil Government of the United States.

[Here Mr. CHOATE reminded Mr. M. that the British Government had distinctly declared that the purpose of this act was limited to British subjects, and not meant to include Americans.]

Mr. M. continued. I am aware of their disclaimer: but I regard it as of no great importance what they say in these diplomatic interchanges of the best reasons they can find to justify the policy which they are resolved to pursue. Their acts we know; and are perfectly able to judge of as plain ones as these, let their declarations be what they may. And now, what is the law that I have stated? Very fair in seeming, and very considerate of our rights. It says that it is to extend to no place within any civil government of the United States. Well, they know perfectly well that we have set up no civil jurisdiction whatever in that entire country; and they have thus far taken care that we shall have nobody there to set it up over; so that they know that they apply their jurisdiction, by this act, to the entire country.

It is clear, then, what England's interpretation of joint occupancy means. Her practice defines it; and it is an exclusive occupancy by her. A "common possession with us," means her having a number of forts; "a free enjoyment by both the high contracting parties," signifies the exclusive fur and lumber trade, saw-mills, hospitals, &c.; to "hunt and to fish" intends, beyond doubt, farms of 3,000 acres, worked by 100 laborers. And then what cautious equity about infringing your jurisdiction, when she has already taken such excellent care that there should be nobody there for you to extend it over! If she meant fairly, surely these things would not be done; and I hold the entire series of her acts, and the manifest designs which they are every day advancing, as an utter and systematic infraction of the treaty by her. In confirmation of this, Mr. M. read a further extract from Captain Wyeth's statement, detailing the proceedings of the Hudson Bay Company.

And now, what says she as to these settlements, and the permanency of claim to them, which she recognises as obtained by those making them?

In the negotiations of 1827, between Mr. Gallatin, on our part, and Messrs. Huskisson and Addington on hers, the latter, on this point, thus declare the intentions of their Government:

"To the interests and establishments which British industry and enterprise have created, Great Britain owes protection. That protection will be given, both as regards settlement and freedom of trade and navigation, with every attention not to infringe the co-ordinate rights of the United States: it being the desire of the British Government, so long as the joint occupancy continues, to regulate its own obligations by the same rules which govern the obligations of every other occupying party."

Protection, then, will be given to these establishments, "both as to settlement and trade." Here, then, are "establishments" and "settlements," valuable and fixed possessions, which England declares herself bound to protect: and this is the joint occupancy! A powerful exclusion on the one hand, and "settlements" and "establishments" and "creations of British industry and enterprise" on the other.

But that "protection" she will render "with every attention not to infringe the co-ordinate rights of the United States." Oh, of course not! Great Britain never infringes any co-ordinate rights of others—never encroaches upon anybody anywhere! No, never! Her scrupulousness in this respect is celebrated over the whole earth, not only upon this continent, but as far as India and China. And then it is so easy for her to reconcile our rights of joint occupancy with this assurance of protecting her subjects of the Hudson Bay Company in whatever they have "created by their enterprise and industry"—all their "settlements and establishments!"

Sir, I held the proceedings of her company most unequivocal; and I urged that her long permission of them was a sanction which made them abundantly her own. But this declaration I take to be an explicit assumption of all these progressive acts of possession—a recognition affirming all that possession, and encouraging her settlers to go on and add whatever other "interests" "British industry and enterprise" can "create."

What, then, are you to do? All admit the rapid tendency of her measures completely and finally to dispossess you. The Senator from Massachusetts says, "if she takes possession, so should we." I agree with him, and think I have shown that she has done so. This bill will but do it equally on our part. It but goes, as we should at least go, pari passu with her. I hold the formal grant of lands to be no more than she has already, in effect, practised. But we can at least give with a condition. Shall she say that she will make settlers whole, and may not we? Can she promise, without an infraction of the convention, that she will make good the establishments of her settlers, and shall not we? Make then no positive grants, but only promise, as she does.

As to our title, the common opinion of the entire Senate makes no doubt of it. Do you intend to abandon it? Does even Great Britain think of doing so with her flimsy claim? When did she ever yield such a pretension, except for a large equivalent? She nourishes no idea of receding from her claim, but takes every measure the most skilful to enforce and to insure it. Hence the train of measures that she is pursuing.

The question then is but, at last, of negotiation or war. Of course, I prefer the former; but, much as I love peace—greatly as I should deplore a breach with that kindred nation—than to yield to this encroachment, I will accept far rather the sad choice of arms. I may say this the rather, because neither my feelings nor my taste have ever led me to rail against Britain. I love that great nation for her noble institutions, her laws, (the freest in the world except our own,) her valor, her policy, her social greatness, her freedom, the venerable mother of ours. But I am jealous of the gigantic progress of her power, her vast designs and grasping temper.

On either continent, and in the remotest shores, she stretches towards a universal empire. Africa feels her; Syria receives her garrisons; on either side of our continent she threatens every shore; and, while she spreads out a new dominion in the great islands of the South Sea, she dispossesses the descendants of the great Mogul, and breaks the commercial wall which has so long separated China from the rest of the world.

It is time to abandon our supineness; it has already placed us at disadvantage enough. We must proceed as Britain proceeds. Do not violate the treaty, but send on your people to settle and defend the country; and give them assurances that they will be protected.

REMARKS OF MR. MERRICK, OF MARYLAND.

In Senate, February 25th, 1843.—Upon the resolutions offered by McDUFFIE, in relation to the State debts.

Mr. WALKER having concluded his remarks—

Mr. MERRICK rose and said: I regret, Mr. President, the necessity which presses upon me again to intrude upon the attention of the Senate, and occupy a further portion of its now almost invaluable time with a discussion leading to no practical results; indeed, I have been much astonished at the pertinacity with which gentlemen on the other side continue to renew and force upon the Senate this discussion, to the exclusion of all the valuable and important subjects for practical legislation pending before us, and, consequently, to the great detriment of the public interest, after the majority of the Senate have twice determined by solemn votes, upon yeas and nays, that they could not and would not, at this time, entertain these abstract propositions. But, much as I have been surprised at this, I am still more surprised—indeed, sir, I am utterly confounded—by the declarations made by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. McDUFFIE] at the conclusion of his remarks, and repeated by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WALKER.] These declarations are of a character so extraordinary and so unusual here, that I am unwilling and unprepared to make any reply to them; and I shall, therefore, leave them to be judged of by the Senate and the country, in the face of which they have been made. Argument would be vain in combating positive declarations that gentlemen will, under certain circumstances, refuse to redeem the bonds of this Government, issued under the sanction of all the forms of a law of Congress; I shall leave them, therefore, to the judgment of the Senate and the country, and pass on to the consideration of the subject more immediately in hand. I have before announced on this floor, that, as often as gentlemen might see fit to renew these assaults upon the States and upon State credit, I felt bound, and held myself prepared, to meet them; and I intend to fulfil the promise then made. It is a solemn duty I owe to my constituents to interpose in every such case. And what excites my special wonder is, the distrust—the unusual and unjustifiable distrust—of the people, manifested by these attempts to force on a discussion here, for no conceivable purpose, unless it be to forestall and control the action of the public mind.

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. McDUFFIE] has been, throughout the whole of that part of his remarks which I was fortunate enough to hear, contending against propositions which have not been presented or suggested here, upon which we are not required to act, and which, so far as they exist at all, are mere subjects of discussion and inquiry among the people; and shall we assume upon ourselves the power, or attempt, in any way, to arrest the people in their discussions and inquiries? Are they not to be trusted to deliberate, to discuss, and inquire into public measures, and make up their minds as to the direction they may see fit to give to their public affairs? Shall we undertake to control and direct them in the exercise of this great and fundamental right, and teach them how they are to demean themselves upon such questions as the gentleman has discussed? or is it not rather our duty, as the mere agents of the States and people, to conform our action to their will? They are the sovereigns—we the agents; and are we so terribly afraid of the ignorance, or incompetence, or wickedness of those for whom we are sent here to act, that the natural order of things must be reversed; and we are to neglect our appropriate and assigned duties, for the purpose of teaching them lessons in advance, and checking the free and full exercise by them of the rights of inquiry and discussion on whatever subject they please to discuss? I rather think it is our duty to obey the behests of public opinion, not to direct or control its formation. Such is at least the professed doctrine, and such should be the practice of gentlemen. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. McDUFFIE] asks if anybody supposes there is any "inherent wealth in this Government, or that they have the power to give to the people any more money than they first extract from the people?" and thence he argues all attempts at relief are worse than useless. Now, sir, I will admit the gentleman's position, but deny his conclusion; because you already have, long since, drawn from the people the money necessary to the acquisition of that vast fund, the public lands, which is adequate and ample to afford all the relief now wanted or asked for, and which you most unjustly withhold, although it can in no other way be so well and beneficially applied. Here is an immense property of almost incalculable value, a part of it acquired by the blood and treasure of our revolutionary fathers, and the residue purchased by money long since contributed by the people generally; which is useless, or worse than useless, to this Government, in the way in which it is now held and disposed of; but which, properly applied, is much more than ample for the relief of the indebted States and the whole community, but which you sternly, remorselessly withhold, turning a deaf ear to all the demands from every quarter for the relief it could afford; and false issues are gotten up about the assumption of State debts, which nobody has proposed, or thinks of proposing; and of this it is that I complain, and against which, in the name and in the behalf of the people of Maryland, I enter my most solemn protest.

Sir, it has been argued that this land fund is utterly insignificant, and therefore you will not grant it—surrender it, rather—to its rightful owners, now that they want it, and are in distress. This argument confutes itself. If the fund be really so insignificant, why do you make such a pother about it? Why not yield it at once, if it is not worth contending for? Be it ever so small, a little would give some relief to people in distress; it would give them comfort, and free you from their vexatious demands. Yet you will not yield it, and your refusal proves the pretence to be false. It is true that but a comparatively small sum appears to have been received into the treasury during the last year from this source; but then it is equally true, and cannot be denied, that, until very lately, these lands had, for a series of years, yielded an average of about ten millions of dollars annually; and there is no doubt that they will, under a proper administration, again yield, in a very little while, as much, or very nearly as much. Now, anybody can calculate how great would be the relief afforded by this sum annually applied to the use of the States. A child can tell you upon what amount of State debts it would pay the interest, at three or at six per cent. There is, sir, a steady but constantly increasing demand for the public lands for settlement and cultivation, bearing a just proportion to the increase of our population, from natural causes, and by emigration to the country. This demand has always heretofore been, and must, in the nature of things, continue to be, progressively increasing. Tell me not, then, that the fund is insignificant, or that as much will not be derived from it in future, if properly administered, as it has heretofore yielded. But gentlemen may ask, why there is so little derived from it just now? I answer, these are extraordinary times of embarrassment and difficulty, and, to some extent, the land sales are affected thereby; but they are much more materially and fatally affected by the manner in which these lands are now disposed of. There is no inducement, under your present pre-emption laws, to purchase at all; on the contrary, there is every possible inducement to delay purchasing. As soon as a district of country is surveyed under your present laws, settlers have a right to go upon, and make selections of the best and most choice portions of it, and they acquire the right of pre-emption; that is, they acquire the right to hold their settlements against all the world, on condition only that they shall pay the Government one dollar and a quarter per acre whenever the Executive shall please to have it sold. This sale he may order in one year, or not for twenty years; and, so long as the public sale is not made by order of the President, the settlers hold and enjoy the lands without interest on the purchase money. They are purchasers on a credit, at the will of the President, without interest. Who can expect that sales will be made, or much revenue derived from these lands, under such a system?

Many years ago it was found that the sale of the public lands upon a credit was unwise, and created the dangerous relation of debtor and creditor between the Government and too many of its citizens. That policy was, therefore, then changed --the existing debts were forgiven, by allowing surrenders, the price of the lands reduced one-half, and cash sales prescribed for the future. But, by some sort of legerdemain, we have now got back to credit sales in a ten times more destructive and dangerous form. How many thousand voters are now on the public lands, the debtors of the Government in fact, under the disguise of pre-emptioners, at the mere will of the President of the United States, for millions of dollars? How anxious must they not be to prolong their credit, since they pay no interest? and how difficult must it not be for a President to resist their solicitations to delay the sales? and how dangerous is not, or may not this absolute control over the interests of such numbers of people become, in the hands of an Executive of this country? Sir, this system must be changed. The people will not longer consent that so great and valuable an inheritance shall be appropriated to the exclusive use of a few, while others are suffering for the want of their just proportion; neither will they much longer allow so great and such dangerous power to remain in the hands of any President.

Something was said in connexion with the subject of State debts the other day, by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. ALLEN,] about British bankers and British brokers. I did not distinctly understand the application of those remarks, but supposed they were intended to lessen the sense of obligation to pay these bonds, because they were held by such people. Mr. President, I have nothing to do with bankers or brokers, British or American. I have no interest in these matters, except as a tax-payer; my taxes I find are heavy, and to pay them I am obliged to part with means necessary to provide properly for the comfort of myself and children. Yet, sir, I do pay them promptly and willingly; and, sir, these children shall toil--yea, sir, they and their sire shall toil, in the earth, so long as this arm is nerved or this heart is warm, sooner than the fair fame of our State shall be tarnished by a refusal to pay to the last cent of our debts, no matter who holds our bonds. Our debts have been fairly contracted; and, by the blessing of God and the efficacy of human energy, we of Maryland will toil on to the last, and submit to all sorts of privations, but we will redeem our plighted faith. Repudiation has no hold in our soil; there were but two members of our last Legislature who were supposed to countenance such a doctrine, and they representing counties always, I believe, opposed to the policy which has produced our indebtedness, and therefore surly and discontented under the pressure of the necessary taxation; and yet, sir, those two gentlemen met, upon their return home, the indignant frowns of their noble-minded constituency, and were dismissed from the public service. Those constituents feel, and deeply feel, the pressure of the times, and are disappointed and dissatisfied to find that direct taxation has come upon them; but, nevertheless, they prefer their difficulties, and will bear them willingly, taxes and all, rather than submit to dishonor. There is still alive among them, sir, (and long may it be cherished!) that proud spirit of sturdy independence and conscious integrity which characterized their honored ancestry. They will never repudiate their debts.

But, sir, while we intend to exert our every nerve to maintain our honor and meet all our engagements—while we shall be delving to earn the means necessary for our subsistence and for this purpose, we shall not be able to forget, in the midst of our toils and privations, that there are those that could easily relieve us, and who will not; that there are those who, having our means in their hands as our trustees—means which our blood and treasure have before acquired, and which are ample for our relief—yet coldly withhold those means from our use, and turn with disdain from our suffering and our wants; nay, more, who select this very time to aggravate both, by unnatural and uncalled-for assaults upon our credit. Sir, we cannot and we will not forget nor overlook these things. We come not to you as mendicants, asking you to assume or pay our debts. No, sir; we disdain all such abasement. But we ask, we demand our rights—our fair proportion of a vast common property, which you are wasting, and which would make us happy if you would but relax your iron grasp.

We have been told, sir, that this subject was to enter into our next elections; and I suppose the object of gentlemen is to make up issues for that election. I am willing, quite willing, to go down to the election upon this, the true issue, as I now put it. Gentlemen must not expect me to allow them to make up false issues upon a question so vitally interesting to my constituents. No, sir; if justice is to be withheld from us, I will at least see that the true issue is made; and upon that I am ready to meet gentlemen before the people. I go for relief—relief, by applying to the present wants and necessities of the people the proceeds of the public lands, which are rightfully theirs, and which you are wasting; and I have before shown, though you now disguise the fact, that this fund properly administered is amply sufficient to afford us great and permanent relief.

I offer you, Mr. President, as an amendment to the resolutions of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. MCDUFFIE,] the following:

Resolved, That most wisely did the fathers of the Republic, in establishing the Constitution of the United States, so frame that sacred instrument that it should be plain, easily understood, and intelligible to all upon whom it was to operate as a rule of action; and that it is not competent for any department of the Government, established by it, to enlarge or contract its true meaning, of which the citizens are, and of necessity must be, in the last resort, the exclusive judges.

Resolved, That it is no part of the assigned duty of the Senate of the United States to expound the Constitution to the people; and every such attempt is a departure from its appropriate sphere of action, and argues a distrust in the capacity of the people for self-government, unwarranted alike by our past history, and the present enlightened state of the public mind.

Resolved, That, whilst it is no part of the duty of the Senate of the United States to expound the Constitution for the people, it is its most solemn duty to exercise the powers intrusted to it by that instrument, in the true spirit and according to the nature of the trust, for the promotion of the happiness and the welfare of the people.

Resolved, therefore, The happiness of the people now requiring it, and full power over the subject being given to Congress, that provision should be made, without further delay, for the fair and equal distribution, among all the States, of the proceeds of the public lands, in such manner as will best tend to remove or alleviate the evils of direct taxation, under which the people of some of the States are now suffering, and which threaten soon inevitably to be visited upon other States.

REMARKS OF MR. HUNTINGTON,

OF CONNECTICUT.

In Senate, February 25, 1843.—On the bill for the repeal of the bankrupt act.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said that it was no part of his purpose to address the Senate on the general subject of the repeal of the bankrupt act. There was one reason (among many others) which would deter him from making a speech now; and that was, the necessity imposed on the Senate to devote the few remaining days of the session to action instead of debate. Our unfinished business was very great, and public expediency and private justice both demanded that we should proceed as rapidly as possible to dispose of it. It might be added, that probably the opinion of every Senator was matured, and that discussion would not alter it. Mr. H. said he had risen solely to assign the reasons for the vote he should give. This it was proper he should do, especially since the appeals which had been made to Senators whose votes were given in favor of the passage of the bankrupt act, and to himself particularly by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. CHOATE,] on a portion of whose remarks he should be pleased to comment, if the business before the Senate should allow it. He should confine himself to a brief explanation of his position, and of the reasons for the course he should pursue. Mr. H. said it was well known that heretofore he had acted with those who were desirous to have a bankrupt law a part of our system. When I came into the Senate, (said Mr. H.,) such an act was under consideration; and the first vote which I gave here was upon a proposition which related to subjecting banking corporations to the provisions of the act. I had the honor to be one of the select committee to which that act was referred for revision and final modification. It received all the attention I was able to give it, and it had my support both in debate and by vote. I continued to advocate and vote for a bankrupt act until it passed the Senate. In doing so, while I followed the dictates of my own judgment, I believed that I was carrying out the views and wishes of a large majority of my constituents. I was aware that there was somewhat of a divided opinion in the State which I represent. I presented many petitions, numerously signed, in favor of a bankrupt law, and very few in opposition to it. I had no reason to doubt that the sentiment of the State was, in general, favorable to its passage. I was, however, left to the free and unbiased expression of my own views, and to such action as my judgment should dictate, by a State which knew I would act from correct motives, and from a conscientious regard to duty, and which has, on more than one occasion, given me the highest proofs of her confidence. And (said Mr. H.) I do not affirm now, that I either misunderstood the opinions of those whom I represent, or that they have undergone any change as to the propriety of the passage of the law at the time when it was enacted. But they are now of opinion that it ought to be repealed. I have received the instructions of the Legislature of Connecticut on this subject, but, as directory and authoritative, they do not control my action. I do not believe in the modern doctrine of instructions. Indeed, there is hardly any doctrine which I consider more palpably unconstitutional, and more eminently dangerous, than that which declares it to be the duty of a Senator to obey the orders of the Legislature or to resign. But I do not mean to enter into any argument on this point. If, however, I did acknowledge the right to require obedience to such orders, I should obey them or resign. I should not profess to be a believer in the doctrine of instruction, and declare my readiness to obey, and at the same time quibble about words, and plead in abatement, or demur specially to the instructions, and thus avoid a compliance by objecting to the form in which the order had been passed. But, as I utterly deny any such authority on the part of a Legislature, I shall not enlarge upon this point. The opinion of such a body I shall treat with respect; and, if I find it to be the expression of the public opinion, maturely formed upon questions of national policy, and that in supporting that opinion no sacrifice of conscience, or honor, or constitutional duty, is required of me, it will receive from me all that attention and respect and weight which, under such circumstances, it eminently deserves. With some exceptions, (of men of the highest character for intelligence and moral worth,) the State which I represent is now decidedly opposed, as I believe, to the continuance of the bankrupt law. The opinions of the people of that Commonwealth have not been hastily formed, nor are they the result of bias, or prejudice, or caprice. They have been deliberately formed, after a careful examination of the subject, and of the operation of the law; and my constituents have spoken, in various forms, in language which cannot be misunderstood, and in a manner which leaves no room for doubt as to their wishes. The bankrupt law is considered by them as a measure which their interests and those of the Union require should not be persevered in, and which ought to be repealed. And now (said Mr. H.) I consider it proper to carry out these views of my constituents. The subject is one on which they have a right to speak, and regarding which their wishes should be carried into effect. It is their right to say that they believe their interests, as well as those of the country generally, will be promoted by the repeal of the bankrupt law. They have exercised that right n different forms, which are plain and intelligible, and which admit, in my judgment, of no reasonable doubt. They believe that those interests require that the act shall not be continued as a part of the law of the land. In voting, therefore, as I shall do, for the repeal of the law, I shall act in accordance, as I think, with the wishes of the people who sent me here—shall respond to the call made upon me by my fellow-citizens who have given me this place of responsibility and honor—and perform an act which will be in accordance with their clearly expressed opinions, and their convictions of what is required by principles of private justice and public expediency. Mr. H. said he had considered it proper to make this explanation, and would leave the subject without further remark.

[The following speech was made at the 2d session of the 27th Congress, as will be seen by its date; but it was not written out by the member and delivered to us until after the Appendix for that session was completed, which will account for its appearance in this volume.]

SPEECH OF MR. J. C. EDWARDS,

OF MISSOURI

In the House of Representatives, July 11, 1842.—On the tariff.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The hour is late, and the House is thin, and several members yet wish to speak; and in two hours after we meet to-morrow, this debate will be closed, under the resolution adopted for that purpose.

I shall say only enough to show my position on the tariff. One hour is not sufficient to enable me to go into the subject fully; and in less than one hour I can state my points, and give the character of my tables, and show the position I occupy in reference to the tariff. At this late hour, and so near the close of this debate, I cannot expect to do more. I may not, then, occupy even the time allowed me; but if, hereafter, I write out my speech, I may avail myself of the usual liberty under the hour rule—that of writing even more than I may say.

I am opposed to this bill. I am not only opposed to this bill, but I have objections to any tariff. But I am especially opposed to this bill. It has unusual features for a tariff—features more than usually objectionable. Its general tendencies will be to encourage domestic manufactures; to cut off foreign importations; and to drive this Government into a system of direct taxation. But, in the progress of my remarks, it will be seen that I have less objection to the general tendencies of the bill, than to its particular features. Any tariff would have the same general tendencies; but a more moderate tariff would hasten the same results less rapidly.

I am opposed to this bill; but I am not unfriendly to manufactures, and never have been, but have always been friendly to them. I have seen many of them flourish in our country, and have taken great pleasure in doing so; and I hope that such as can be made profitable will continue to flourish. The manufacture of those things which we are compelled to have during a state of war, we should encourage at any expense, and at all hazards.

I am opposed to a tariff: but we necessarily have one; and, while that is the case, a fair protection will be given to our manufactures generally. But that tariff which will give the most revenue, under existing circumstances, will give as much protection as the manufacturing interest should ask for. Too high a tariff will lead to results unfavorable to the manufacturing interests themselves. A high tariff will reduce our revenue too much, and force us too soon to direct taxation, even for the manufacturing interests. It will force into existence manufactures which cannot be profitable except under a high tariff, and which must be abandoned when we are driven to direct taxation.

The lowest revenue standard is the highest protection that should be asked. The expense of importing foreign merchandise cannot be less than ten per cent., and often reaches fifteen. If it reaches only ten, this is a protection of ten per cent. to our domestic manufactures. If our tariff be only twenty per cent., this, added to the expense of importing, will make a protection of at least thirty per cent. This ought to be enough. But this protection has always been much more, and, under this bill, will be greatly more—not less than forty or forty-five per cent., on an average; and, on many articles, one hundred per cent.

The cultivation of the soil is the great leading employment in our country. Almost every man who has no employment more profitable, engages in agriculture. Almost every man who engages in any trade, or traffic, or speculation, or manufacture, does so because he believes it more profitable than cultivating the soil. And a great question in this discussion is, whether we should make other pursuits more profitable than agriculture. We are not forced into the manufacturing system for want of land to cultivate. We shall have plenty of room for all our population for years to come, and much to spare.

By our last census, we have 3,717,750 persons engaged in agriculture. Of all the other classes, but 978,651 have employments. Of this number, 15,203 are engaged in mining; 117,575 in commerce; 56,025 in navigating the ocean; 33,067 in navigating canals and rivers; 65,236 engaged in the learned professions; and 791,545 in manufactures and trades. The population engaged in agriculture is about five times as great as that engaged in manufactures and trades both together. All the other interests of the country bear but a small proportion to the agricultural. It is the leading employment in point of numbers; and they have the power to say—if they choose to say it—whether they will be taxed to support other classes, or not; and, if so, then how much. The tax on imported goods is a tax on the people at large, and a protection to the manufacturers, at least to the amount of the tax.

We must have a revenue. If we raise it by a tax on importations generally, then we must protect manufactures to the extent of the tax on manufactured articles. More protection than this should not be asked. If any description of manufactures is more profitable in our Government than agriculture—our great leading employment—then that description of manufacture can be put into operation, and can be encouraged and made to prosper, without the aid and protection of Government. If any description of manufactures is only equally profitable with agriculture, then that description of manufacture may be put into operation, and made to flourish as well as agriculture itself, without the aid and protection of the Government. If any description of manufacture be less profitable than agriculture, that can be put into operation and made to flourish only by taxing agriculture, and the more profitable descriptions of manufactures, and other pursuits, to such an extent as to protect the unprofitable manufactures.

The tax we have been in the habit of levying on imported goods for revenue, has operated, to the extent of that tax, as a protection to domestic manufactures. If the tax for revenue be twenty per cent., then those manufactures which are twenty per cent. less profitable than agriculture can be put into operation, and made to flourish as well as agriculture. If any description of manufacture requires more protection than twenty per cent., then the question may well begin to arise, whether this manufacture is not costing the other pursuits of the country more than it is worth. We must have revenue; and, while we continue the system of imposts, we must give protection; but that protection should not be made to cost us too much.

It is wrong to impose taxes upon profitable employments, to encourage unprofitable employments; to drive capital from profitable investments to unprofitable investments; to drive people from profitable labor to unprofitable labor. When the Government does so, the country suffers a clear loss of the difference in the value of the employments, and of the expense in making the exchange from one employment to the other. When she does so, she acts the part of an unwise and foolish Government, and retards her own progress to greatness, and that of her people to happiness and wealth. Her interference with the labor and industry of the country may enrich a few of her citizens; but, in proportion as partial legislation enriches a few—and, perhaps, in a still greater proportion—it will impoverish the balance. And, what is still worse: her influence, when exercised, operates for the benefit of the wealthy, and to the injury of the poor. If she interferes at all in the employments of her citizens, her interference should operate in the other direction. It would be better to distribute the abundance in the coffers of the rich, among the poor and the needy, than to extract the pittances from the pockets of the poor, to be hoarded in the coffers of the rich. But the Government should interfere with neither. Hands should be kept off. Each should be allowed to seek the employment which nature and circumstances, unconnected with partial legislation, have rendered most profitable; and each should be allowed to reap the full fruits of his own industry and labor. Give every man an equal chance. God, no doubt, wills that each should have fair play. One part of us should claim no advantage over the balance of our countrymen; and the balance of us should submit to no inequality which God himself has not created. We should submit quietly to no law which gives to one part of our community advantages, or privileges, or immunities, which the balance of us do not enjoy; and we should oppose all laws which tend to create distinctions, whether in wealth, or in rank, or in titles. As a general rule, the Government should aid no class of her citizens, when she must do it at the expense of other classes, no matter how large or how small. No one part of our country, and no one class of our citizens, should be made subservient to another.

I am opposed to this bill—first, because it is prohibitory; second, because it contains the minimum principle; third, because it taxes sugar, and coffee, and salt; fourth, because the general rate of duties is too high for the purposes of revenue; fifth, because it proposes to repeal the twenty per cent. clause in the distribution act; sixth, because under this, as well as under any other tariff, the taxes collected are not in proportion to the property protected—the poor often paying as much as the rich, and frequently more; and, seventh, because of all others, the system of imposts is the most expensive, and consequently the most oppressive, system of taxation.

1. This bill prohibits the importation of many articles. So far, it is unconstitutional. No power is granted to this Government to prohibit the importation of foreign goods. And this Government can do only what she is empowered to do by the Constitution. It is otherwise with the State Governments: they can do whatever they are not restrained by their constitution from doing. If the people of a State had no constitution, their Legislature would be unrestrained, and could do anything in the power of a legislative body to do. But our States have constitutions, and these constitutions restrain the action of the State Legislatures, by prescribing what they shall not do; but leave them the power to do everything which a legislative body can do, except those things which the constitutions prohibit them from doing. Not so with Congress—the Legislature of the United States. She can exercise only such powers as are delegated to her by the Constitution of the United States. If any reasonable doubt had ever existed on this point, that doubt should have been forever settled by the tenth amendment to the Constitution. This amendment provides that "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people." No powers are vested in this Government, except such as are "delegated to the United States by the Constitution." No power is given to prohibit the importation of goods. The power given to Congress on the subject of taxation is "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises; to pay the debts, and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States." Taxes must be laid and collected "to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare," and not to prevent the importation of merchandise; and by that means to give aid to the manufacturers, or any other particular class. If taxes are to be laid "to pay debts," then they must be laid to collect revenue, else no "debts" can be paid. But taxes, duties, and imposts, laid to prohibit the importation of merchandise, are not intended to collect revenue "to pay debts;" and do not collect revenue, but prevent the collection of revenue; and are, therefore, unconstitutional.

2. This bill is odious, because it contains the minimum principle. On cotton manufactures, this bill fixes a duty of thirty per cent. ad valorem. The expression "ad valorem" does not mean, under this bill, according to actual value, but according to the value which the bill fixes on an article. But the language of the bill explains itself. It provides "that all manufactures of cotton, or of which cotton shall be a component part, not dyed, colored, printed, or stained, not exceeding in value twenty cents per square yard, shall be valued at twenty cents per square yard." Thirty per cent. on a yard, valued at twenty cents per yard, is six cents tariff; making the article, with cost and tariff, worth twenty-six cents. If the article be worth anything less than twenty cents per yard, it is still valued as if worth twenty cents per yard, and is taxed six cents accordingly. If the yard of cotton be worth but six cents, or less than six cents per yard, (and many descriptions are worth less than six cents,) still they are valued as if worth twenty cents, and pay the six cents tax per yard. A tax of six cents on goods worth but six cents, is a tax of one hundred per cent., when the bill professes to be but thirty per cent. ad valorem. It is unfortunate that the people of the country cannot generally know that, out of every two dollars which they pay for coarse cotton manufactures, they pay one in the shape of taxes, and profits on taxes, to this Government. It is unfortunate that this tax falls mainly upon the poor, who buy the coarse article; and not upon the rich, who buy the fine article. It is unfortunate that, while the rich pay but thirty per cent. upon their fine cottons, the poor are compelled to pay one hundred per cent. upon their coarse cottons. It may be answered that coarse cottons are still sold cheap. If this be so, the evil still exists.

Cottons imported cannot be sold for less than the cost and the tax. If the cost be six cents per yard, and the tax be six cents per yard, then the yard must be sold for twelve cents; and, at that price, the seller makes no profit. It may be said that the competition in making the domestic article reduces it below twelve cents. If an article, equal to the imported article, worth six cents per yard, can be made here and sold for eleven cents per yard, this will exclude the importation of the foreign article, because that must bring twelve cents per yard—the cost and the tax—else the importer loses on every yard of it. If an article can be made here, and sold for less than twelve cents, similar to a foreign article which costs six cents here, and pays a tax of six cents, then the manufacture of the former must exclude the importation of the latter. If for an article equal to an imported article, worth only six cents per yard, we pay our home manufacturer eleven cents per yard; then we give him a bounty of five cents per yard, and this, on one million of yards, would be fifty thousand dollars.

The same section of this bill provides, that "all manufactures of cotton, or of which cotton shall be a component part," "dyed, colored, printed, or stained, in whole or in part, not exceeding in value thirty cents the square yard, shall be valued at thirty cents." If they cost but six cents, they shall be valued as if they cost thirty; and if they cost but six cents per yard, they shall pay nine cents tax per yard. This is the minimum principle, and its operation. I shall select only these examples from the law. The principle is odious, because eminently unjust to the poor, and grievously oppressive.

3. This bill taxes sugar, coffee, and salt. So far as the tax on these articles goes, (and no small amount of our revenue will be raised from them,) they diminish the bounties which we pay to the manufacturer. Salt should be excepted. The drawbacks on this article about equal the taxes collected from it. But while we diminish the bounties to the manufacturer, by taxing sugar, coffee, and salt, we increase the profits paid by the consumer upon these articles. But the general and nearly equal use of these articles among all classes, rich and poor, is the principal objection to taxing them. The poor and the rich have families about equal in size. If there be a difference, the families of the poor are generally larger than those of the rich. The poor, who live hard, and work harder, are strong, robust, and hearty, and, consequently, eat more. The rich, who live easily, and work none, are, consequently, more delicate and more abstemious, and eat less. While the former would drink his three cups of coffee, the latter would generally be content with one. The poor, then, would use more sugar and coffee, and probably more salt, than the rich; and would, therefore, pay more taxes on these articles than the rich. This would be against the general principle that the Government should collect taxes from her citizens in proportion to the property which she protects for them. This is taxing provisions, labor, and numbers, instead of taxing property. The poor cannot escape the tax, unless they deny themselves the use of these articles. This they do not, and ought not to do, unless you tax them too heavily. If all are not supplied bountifully with sugar, coffee, and salt, they ought to be; and any law which prevents a bountiful supply of these articles, is a cruel and an oppressive law. And if, by the tax, you prevent the people from eating, you do not get the tax; and you starve them, and you practise your cruelty, and you are guilty of oppression, without getting your profit.

4. The general rate of duties in this bill is too high. The object of the tariff is to raise revenue. I am willing to discriminate; but discriminations should be for the purposes of raising revenue and equalizing the taxes, rather than for the purpose of encouraging one class of citizens, or one particular pursuit, by giving them part of the profits of other classes or other pursuits. In favor of those articles which are indispensable in time of war, we should discriminate But for manufactures generally, there will be protection enough under a tariff for revenue, without any unjust and oppressive discrimination. Too much discrimination will ruin the manufacturers themselves. It will amount to prohibition, and prohibition will drive us to direct taxation. A fair revenue tariff gives as much protection as most manufacturers should want.

If an article can be made in another country, for example, and sold to us 25 per cent. cheaper than we can make and sell it, then we ought to buy the article from that other country, instead of making it ourselves; and we should direct our capital and our labor to some other pursuits more profitable. No man has a right to call upon the Government to make his employment more profitable than that of other men; yet the Government does this very thing. By an ordinary tariff, she gives to the manufacturer protection to the amount of that tariff; and, to that amount, advantage over other pursuits, only equally profitable, and which are unprotected. Of the latter class, are commerce, navigation, and agriculture. The latter is, to some extent, protected by this bill; but that protection is a mere pretence, and a humbug. You protect cotton, hemp, and tobacco, when the fertility of our soil, and the adaptation of our climate to the growth and production of these articles, enable us to make them cheaper than any part of the world. No nation can undersell us without your protection, unless you inflate our currency so as to make us the market and the common receptacle for everything which the balance of the world produces. We not only undersell other nations at home in these articles, but we undersell them abroad. Your protection, then, is a humbug and a mockery.

But the manufacturer is not content with the advantage which a tax for revenue gives him. He wants more. He wants the burdens of the revenue collected from such articles as are manufactured by himself. He does not buy the foreign article, but uses his own. He pays no tax, then, on these articles. A portion of his countrymen buy his article, and pay him what the imported article would cost, and the tax on the imported article. The latter part of the price of his article is the bounty which we pay to him as protection. Another part of his countrymen buy the imported article, and they pay the cost of that article, and the tariff on that article; and from this class are collected the revenues of the Government. The manufacturer escapes the tax; the purchaser of the domestic article pays a tax to the manufacturer, instead of paying one to the Government; and the purchaser of the imported article pays all the revenue of the Government. Then you not only protect the manufacturer, but you exempt him from tax, so far as he consumes his own manufacture instead of the foreign.

5. This bill proposes to repeal the 20 per cent. clause in the distribution law. The substance of this clause is, that if any rate of duties over 20 per cent. is imposed after the passage of the distribution act, then the distribution is to be suspended. This bill proposes to raise the duties above 20 per cent., and at the same time to repeal the law suspending the distribution. I shall say nothing now of the unconstitutionality of collecting revenue to distribute among the States, whether it be from the customs or from the public lands. The inexpediency of the measure is objection enough. This Government is in debt, and unable to pay—is a beggar, and unable to borrow. She wants to give away money, when she has none for her own use, much less to give. This is evidently unwise and impolitic; but this subject I will notice further hereafter.

6. I stated, as a general objection to a tariff, that the taxes paid under it were not in proportion to the property protected by the Government; because the poor generally paid as heavy taxes under the tariff as the rich, and often more. The tax on sugar is one example; on coffee, another; and on salt, another. The tax on cottons and other articles where the minimum principle prevails, is an example where the rich pays his 30 per cent. on fine cottons, and the poor 100 per cent. on coarse cottons. These are inequalities under this particular bill, but no tariff can be arranged so as to operate equally. Their unequal operation is an objection to tariffs generally. The manufacturer is measurably exempt from their operation; and while others are burdened to death, he is enriched by them. As the disease profits the physician, and kills the patient, so the tariff profits the manufacturer, and ruins the consumer.

7. Of all others, the system of imposts is the most expensive, and, consequently, the most oppressive system of taxation. From 1830 to 1840, including both years, $210,707,992 were collected. The expense of collecting this sum was $15,160,14[illegible]. This was an expense of over 7¼ per cent. for collecting. But this is not the expense which I allude to, as making it a most expensive and oppressive system of taxation. I allude to an expense far more enormous, extravagant, and oppressive. I allude to the profits which are paid by the consumer upon the tax which goes into the treasury. In examining this part of the subject, I may not allude again to the 7¼ per cent. for collecting. That is too insignificant to be noticed here; but the accumulation of profits on the tax, by the time they are paid by the consumer, amounts to a sum which seems incredible to any one who has not made the calculation for himself.

I shall examine this part of the subject as it operates upon the West. Of part of that country I have the right to speak. On the balance of the Union the operation is of the same character, but not in every part to the same extent; but is extensive and injurious on all, after you leave the sections of country immediately around the importing cities and custom-houses.

The goods which we use in the West, on which the tariff is collected, pass first through the hands of the importer; second, through the hands of the jobber; third, through the hands of the Western city merchant; fourth, through the hands of the village or country merchant; and, fifth, into the hands of the consumer; and there they stop. Each one of these persons has his profit, till you come to the consumer, who pays all the profits which accumulate on the goods before they reach his hands, and makes none himself. This accumulation of profits applies not only to the tax upon the goods, but also to the original cost; and it applies not only to foreign goods, but also to domestic goods made East; and not only to the actual value of the domestic goods, but also to any bounty which we may pay to the manufacturer. But my main object is, to show the accumulation of profits on the tariff, and the expense and cost of collecting revenue by that system.

As before said, the goods used in the West go through the hands of the importer, the jobber, the Western city merchant, the village or country merchant, and the consumer. To the importer, the jobber pays ten per cent. profit; to the jobber, the Western city merchant pays twenty per cent. profit; to the Western city merchant, the village or country merchant pays thirty per cent. profit; and to the village or country merchant, the consumer pays fifty per cent. profit. I assume these as the average profits charged. These profits are not always realized, because under the credit system many bad debts are contracted, and many losses are sustained. But these profits are collected from those who pay. When loafers fail to pay, working-men are mulcted to make up the deficiency.

If the profits which I have assumed be too high, that does not change the principle, or prevent the enormous accumulation of costs in collecting the tariff from the Western people, but only mitigates the evil. If, in any case, I have assumed profits that are too high, those who know the profits actually charged can correct me, and can easily make the calculations for themselves at the true profits. If these profits are thought by any to be higher than are charged, let them be reduced even one-half, and then let them calculate the profits upon the tariff at this reduction; and they will still see that, of all systems of taxation, it is the most oppressive and ruinous to the Western people. The same remark applies to other portions of the Union, but not to all to the same extent. I know at many of the Western village and country merchants purchase their own goods in the Eastn cities, and thus cut off the profit to the Westn city merchant; but I have yet to learn that ey do so to enable them to sell their goods the eaper, and that they do not do so to reap the hole amount of profits themselves. But, if they sell cheaper in such cases, still this only mitiates, and does not remove the evil; but leaves tariff still the most ruinous of all systems of ation on the West. And what is worse—it is inous to the people without benefiting the Govnment. Even the manufacturer gains but a pitce of what the consumers lose. Even the aler in merchandise can hardly be a gainer by heavy profits paid on the tariff. If he pays e hundred per cent. tariff, and one hundred per nt. cost, it is true he makes as much profit upon e tariff as he makes upon the cost, and pays only lf the amount of freight, drayage, wharfage, and prage, and gains by saving half these expenses; t these are mere drops in the bucket, and make show in the general price of the merchandise. is insurance is just the same as if he paid no riff, and bought twice the amount of goods. And instead of one hundred per cent., the merchant id no tariff, he could then trade on twice as ny goods, and make the same profit, and run greater risk; and the consumer would be benefited by getting double the amount of goods for e same amount of money. The same observaons apply to any tariff less than one hundred per nt., with this difference only: that, as you diminh the tariff, you diminish the injurious operaon of the tariff; and as you increase the tariff, you crease its ruinous effects. The operation of the riff, then, not only ruins the consumer, but it ins the merchant also. The latter depends upon e former, and the latter fails because the former ils—the latter is ruined because the former is ined. When you break down the farmer, the erchant has no shoulders to rest upon.

Let us calculate the cost of the tariff on the Westn people; and, while we are at it, we can look at e accumulation of profits upon the original cost an article, as well as at the accumulation of ofits upon the tariff paid on that cost. It will oduce no confusion to look at both at once. We e ruined by both. For our purpose, let us asme that the original cost of an article is what it s cost the importer when it reaches the customouse, and before the tariff is paid. Here the imorter pays the tariff. The tariff and the original st make the whole cost to him. The importer arges 10 per cent., the jobber 20 per cent., the Western city merchant 30 per cent., and the village country merchant 50 per cent. The profits end ith the village or country merchant. The conmer makes no profits, but pays all.

To get the accumulation of profits upon the origial cost, or upon the tariff, you must add the first ofit to the original cost, or to the tariff, as the case ay be, and then calculate the second profit; add at to the cost and first profit, or tariff and first ofit, and on that calculate the third profit; add is to the cost and two first profits, or to the tariff d two first profits, and on this calculate your arth profit; then add this to the cost and three rst profits, or to the tariff and three first profits, d you have the amount paid by the Western nsumer in the shape of cost and profits on cost, d in the shape of tariff and profits on tariff; and, y adding the two together, you have the cost, the riff, the profits on cost, and the profits on tariff, aking the whole amount paid by the consumer.

From the profits here charged on the cost and on e tariff, should be deducted the expenses for eight, insurance, drayage, wharfage, and storage; at these expenses are too insignificant to be noced in treating of others of such stupendous magitude as those we are now exposing. The 7½ per ent. expense of collecting the revenue will be uch more than an offset to the expense of insurance, freight, drayage, wharfage, and storage; but t one balance the other.

To make this matter clear—to show the vast accumulation of profits on the cost, and the vast accumulation of profits on the tariff; to show the enormous expense of collecting a revenue by a system f imposts—let us now give an example. One hundred yards of common broadcloth (an article everywhere abundantly used in the Western country) in he hands of the importer in New York, at the custom-house, before the tariff is paid—freight, insurance, and all other charges up to that time paid—would be worth, say two dollars per yard; making the one hundred yards worth to the importer $200. On this the importer pays the tariff; which, by the bill before us, is forty per cent.; making the tariff on the one hundred yards of cloth $80; thus raising the price, in the hands of the importer, from $200 to $280. The Government tax being paid, the cloth is now free from the custom-house; and the importer can sell without the charge of smuggling. He sells to the jobber for 10 per cent. advance. This is $20 profit on the original cost of the goods, and $8 profit on the tariff; making, together, the sum of $28, and raising the cloth in the hands of the jobber from $280 to $308. The jobber sells to the St. Louis merchant, and charges him a profit of 20 per cent. This makes $44 on the cost and previous profit on cost, and $17 60 on the tariff and previous profit on the tariff; and raises the article, in the hands of the Western city merchant, from $308 to $369 60. The Western city merchant sells to the country merchant, and charges a profit of 30 per cent. This makes $79 20 on the original cost of the article, and the two previous profits on the original cost; and the sum of $31 68 cts. on the tariff, and two previous profits on the tariff; making the whole value of the article, in the hands of the village or country merchant, $480 48 cts. The village or country merchant sells to the consumers—to the farmers, mechanics, lawyers, doctors, speculators, loafers, and negroes—and charges an average profit of 50 per cent. This profit makes $171 60 on the original cost of the goods and three previous profits on the original cost, and $68 64 on the tariff and three previous profits on the tariff; and raises the value of the article in the hands of the village or country merchant from $480 48 to $720 42; the original cost—the cost at the custom-house before the tariff is paid—be it remembered, being but $200.

The cost of the one hundred yards of cloth, then, at the custom-house, before the tariff is paid, is $200. The importer pays the tariff, or tax—the latter is the right name. The cost to him, then, is $280; to the jobber $308; to the Western city merchant $369 60; to the village or country merchant $480 48; and to the Western consumer $720 42; being an excess over the original of $520 42. The whole profit on the original cost paid by the consumers would be $314 80; making the profits exceed the original cost $114 80; and the whole profit on the tariff would be $125 92; making the profits exceed the tariff $45 92. This is a profit of 157 per cent. on cost and on tariff; and this profit is the cost of collecting revenue from the Western consumer of imported merchandise. If this be so, then, beyond all question, I have sustained my position, that the system of imposts is the most expensive, and, consequently, the most oppressive of all systems of taxation. I am either deranged on this subject, or else the people of the West, and of other parts of the Union, are unmindful of their interests, and have neglected to look at the operation of the tariff on their interests in its true light. This is the operation of the tariff in the West, in reference to a particular item. It is the same in principle in reference to all other articles which are taxed. It will only consume time to notice others.

I have no doubt I shall be met here, by many, with the answer that I have assumed profits higher than are charged. It is not my wish to do so. I want to present the case as it exists. None should be afraid to look at the naked truth. To shut our eyes against it, will not prevent its effect. Let us, then, assume but half these profits. Everybody will admit that half is greatly under the profits charged. Let us give to the importer 5 per cent.; to the jobber 10 per cent.; to the Western city merchant 15 per cent.; to the village or country merchant 25 per cent.; and to the consumer the task of paying all,—and then see the result. Let us take the same item, 100 yards of cloth, at $2 per yard; making $200 cost, and $80 tariff. The 5 per cent. profit to the importer added on, would make the cost to the jobber $210, and the tariff $84; the 10 per cent. profit to the jobber would make the cost to the Western city merchant $231, and the tariff $92 40; the 15 per cent. to the Western city merchant would make the cost to the village or country merchant $266 60, and the tariff $106 26; and the 25 per cent. to the village or country merchant, would make the cost and profits on cost to the consumer $332 25, and the tariff and profits on tariff $132 82; the profits on cost being $132 25; and the profits on tariff being $52 82—being a profit of 66 per cent. on the original cost of the cloth, and an expense of 66 per cent. for collecting the tax—an expense unheard of under any other system of taxation. But everybody knows that these profits are nothing like the profits usually charged. The importer is known to get his 10 per cent., the jobber 20, the Western city merchant 30, and the village or country merchant 50, or nearly those sums. The exact sums can be fixed by those who know the profits charged. Let us now look at the more extended operation of this system.

We have 17,000,000 of inhabitants. By this bill, we propose to raise $27,000,000 of revenue. By the last enumeration, Missouri had 383,702 inhabitants. With this population, our proportion of the $27,000,000 of tariff, if we pay in proportion only to the balance of the Union, will be $609,232. The profits on this amount of tariff, paid by the people of Missouri who consume the merchandise on which the tariff is collected, is $959,165. Added together, the tariff and profits on the tariff paid in Missouri are $1,568,379. This would be a tax and profit, counting men, women, and children of all ages, nations, and colors, of four dollars and nine cents per head. Allowing an average of five persons for each family, we shall have 3,400,000 families in the United States, and 76,740 in the State of Missouri; and the former number of tax-payers in the Union, and the latter number in the State. This number will make the average tax and profit on tax in Missouri amount to twenty three dollars and forty-three cents per head of a family; a tax exceeding the net annual average income of half the families in the West, and of more than half the families in the Union.

While the 373,702 inhabitants are paying $1,568,379 of tariff and profit on tariff, that $609,232 of this sum may go into the treasury of the United States, or, rather, into the hands of the collectors, the 5,000,000 of Western people are paying tariff in the same proportion and profit on that tariff, it will be reasonable to say, equal to one-half the profit paid by Missouri. The tariff of the 5,000,000 of Western people will then be about $8,289,000. If the profits on this amount equalled the profit paid by the people of Missouri on their portion of the tariff, these profits would amount to about $17,000,000. But let us set them down at one-half; and then the people of the West will pay $16,000,000—being the tariff and profits united, that the Government may get $8,000,000 of tax.

We should look at this subject calmly and without prejudice, and without party leanings. We should examine and investigate it closely and thoroughly. We should look at it, stripped of its mystery, and reduced to its nakedness; and, whether the picture be beautiful or deformity itself, our interest and our prosperity as individuals, and as a nation, require us to sift it thoroughly. But this subject is much larger, its deformity much greater, its ruinous influences much more extensive, when we take a full view. I have given here far less than half the picture; and what I shall yet say will still leave it imperfect and unfinished.

I have yet taken no notice of the protected articles manufactured in our own country. By protected articles, we mean such as are manufactured in our own country, as well as in foreign countries, and which are taxed when imported into our own country from foreign countries. Cotton cloth, for example, is a protected article. That is manufactured in our own country, and is also imported from other countries; and when so imported, is taxed, and this tax is the protection to the home manufacture. A yard of cotton cloth is worth (say) 20 cents at the door of the custom-house. On this, our bill fixes a duty of 30 per cent. This 30 per cent. upon 20 cents—the price of the cloth per yard—is 6 cents tax per yard. This 6 cents per yard the importer must pay to the collector of the customs before he ventures to sell his goods, else he is indictable for smuggling. Then, this yard of cloth costs the importer 26 cents before he can sell to the jobber. The domestic article, of exactly the same quality, is worth no more than the imported article; but, as the imported article cannot be sold for less than 26 cents per yard—the cost and tariff—so the domestic article of equal value will also command 26 cents per yard, the cost and bounty—or protection, if the term be better. And, under this state of the market, we pay the manufacturer 6 cents on every yard of cotton cloth manufactured by him, over and above its actual value. If the domestic article be reduced to 25 cents per yard, and can supply the demand at that price, then the foreign article will be excluded; because that cannot be sold for less than the cost and tax—the 26 cents per yard; and, at this point, this article ceases to yield any revenue to the Government; and the tariff, as to this article, becomes purely protective—prohibitory—and not a tariff for revenue. If, by the aid of a tariff to increase the price of the imported article, the domestic article can be made to supply the demand, and to sell for less than the imported article, the domestic article will utterly exclude the foreign article. At this point, the constitutional object of a tariff—that of raising revenue "to pay the debts, and provide for the common defence and general welfare"—totally ceases. I give this example, and but this one. The same remarks apply to other protected articles as well as this.

By this bill, the manufacturer has 6 cents bounty, or protection, on the yard of cotton cloth worth 20 cents. This is 30 per cent. The protection on some articles is less than 30 per cent.; on some largely over--say 100 per cent.; and, on many, greatly over that. Even cottons which, ostensibly, are taxed but 30 per cent., are, in reality, many of them, taxed 100 per cent. and more. Let us, however, assume 30 per cent. as the average protection or bounty.

Our statistical tables for 1840 give, as the amount of cotton manufactures for that year, $46,350,453. At an average of 12 cents to the yard, this sum would give us 386,253,941 yards. At 6 cents per yard, this amount would give the manufacturers of cotton $23,115,236 of protection or bounty. And this sum is paid to the manufacturer by the people who use the domestic manufactured article, while those who use the foreign article pay the revenues of the Government.

These same tables show that the woollens manufactured in the United States in 1840 were estimated at $20,696,999. The tariff on woollens is 40 per cent., and 40 per cent. on this sum is $8,278,799. And this sum the consumers of woollens pay to the manufacturers of woollen goods, as protection or bounty. Let it never be forgotten, here or elsewhere, that on these immense bounties the consumers generally pay profits still more immense. I specify but these two out of the multitude of protected articles. I can only give examples.

I have not made the examination myself, but my honorable friend from Alabama [Mr. D. H. LEWIS] states to me that the whole catalogue of protected articles amounted, in 1840, to $395,000,000. I think this an over-estimate; but no matter. The principle can be seen. Thirty per cent. upon this sum is $108,500,000; and, if the amount of protected articles be not overrated, then the people who buy and consume these articles pay to the manufacturers $108,500,000 in the shape of protection or bounty. The profits which accumulate upon this bounty, before the goods get into the hands of the consumer, must not be forgotten. If there be any truth in these calculations, we can see therein one cause, and a prominent cause, of the deep distress and embarrassment pervading the land.

As 383,702 inhabitants (the population of Missouri) is to 17,000,000 of inhabitants, (the population of the United States,) so is the portion of bounty paid by Missouri for protection to $108,500,000, the amount paid by the Union. By this rule, the amount of bounty paid by Missouri on protected articles, supposing her to pay only in proportion as the other States pay, is $2,461,698. If we add the profits on this bounty, and calculate them as we have before calculated these profits, we shall have $6,337,410 as the amount of bounty and profits on bounty, to be paid by the people of Missouri. But, in the West, we should do the manufacturer injustice to fix the profits on his goods as high as on foreign goods. The domestic goods do not pass through as many hands as the foreign goods, before they get to the consumer in the West, and consequently do not accumulate as many profits.

I have said this much, to show that the system of imports was, of all modes of taxation, the most expensive, and consequently the most oppressive on the West.

For the reasons thus given, I am opposed to this bill; and, for a part of these reasons—the part which must exist against any tariff—I am forced to believe that the system of imposts is an injurious, oppressive, and unwise mode of collecting revenue.

My figures may not be exactly accurate; but, if they are not, in most cases they will be found rather to range under than over the mark. Every man should look into this matter. We know there is immense suffering all over the country. We are always at work; we are always in want; we are always in debt; and we are always oppressed. Much the largest portion of our population know all these things. Only a few—those who are born to fortunes, and are fortunate enough to retain them—are ignorant of these things. There are some who never knew what it was to work, to want, to be in debt, to suffer, or to be oppressed; but the great mass of the people know all these things well. Work, want, debt, suffering, and oppression, are known all over the land. There must be some cause for it. It may be, we are taxed too heavily. We should examine.

But, if taxed heavily, we are told we do not feel the tariff, because we do not know we pay it. This may be our sad mistake: no doubt it is. Every man feels it, and most grievously too; and the poor man, on whom the heaviest tariff falls, feels it most: but, unfortunately for him, although he knows he feels something sorely, yet he does not know what it is he feels. He knows he is hurt, but does not know the thing that hurts him. He feels the wound, but does not know whence the arrow sped. It will be agreed that the sick man is none the better off, and suffers none the less, in consequence of not knowing the character of his disease. And the man who pays the tariff, and the profits on the tariff, is none the better off for thinking it the cost, and profit on the cost; or for knowing nought about it. The man who thinks his disease is light, but finds it at length the cholera, will run the risk of dying; and the man who thinks his tax is light, but finds it out to be the tariff, will run the risk of being ruined.

Every man feels the operation of the tariff. He feels it in whatever he eats, drinks, or wears. No man escapes the tariff. Every man, woman, and child in the land is affected by it. None can escape. Every being that eats its salt is affected by it. His salt is taxed nearly half its value. Every family uses sugar and coffee: these are taxed by this bill. Almost every man, who does not wear fine linen, buys his cotton shirt: if coarse, this is taxed 100 per cent.; if fine, 50. The young men buy cloth coats: these are taxed 40 per cent. When their coats cost them 25 dollars, 10 dollars of the price is tax, and profits on tax. Boots, hats, shoes, axes, oes, plouhghs, flannels, blankets, calicoes, and everything else, are taxed, (a few free articles excepted)—and these, many of them, for the benefit of the manufacturer. We pay this tax as much as we would a direct tax; we feel this tax as much as we would a direct tax. More: we pay this tax, and these profits on this tax; there are no profits on a direct tax. And yet we take the indirect, and are afraid to meet a direct tax!

Let no man deceive himself, by supposing that he escapes the tax, because it is indirect. Let no man suppose he does not feel it, because he does not notice it, on every item on which he pays it. In my State, let him look into the justices' courts, into the county courts, into the circuit courts, where debts are collected. Let him examine the number of suits. Let him examine the accounts on which these suits are founded. Let him examine the items of these accounts, and see how many are for tariffed articles, and how much they are taxed. If the debt has been liquidated, and the suit be founded on a note or bond, let him ask the parties what character of articles made up the debt. Let him inquire how much cost accumulates in the suit, and what part of that is properly chargeable to the tariff. Let him inquire if the defendant could not have paid the debt, if it had been 100 per cent. less, 50 per cent. less, 40 per cent. less, 30 per cent. less, or even 20 per cent. less. The tariff on the debts for merchandise will generally equal the smaller sums, and often the larger sums. If, after these inquiries, any man still doubts whether the people feel the tariff or not, then let him see the judgment rendered, the execution issued, the property levied on and sacrificed, the wives and children turned out of house and home; and then let him say whether the indirect system of taxation is felt or not. I have no doubt half the suits in the West—probably eight out of ten, large and small—are for merchandise. Those who escape for a while are eventually worn down with the tax, and the profits on the tax; and then they are brought within the clutches of the merchant; and the Western merchant himself does not escape his higher merchant. Our courts all over the West, and everywhere else, are filled with suits. The great body of the people have no comfort. They are suffering, mentally and physically, and all the time, with pecuniary embarrassments. They avoid their creditors; they dread the approach of an officer; they are afraid to hear their own dogs bark; the hair rises on their heads when they hear their gates turning upon their hinges. In every visiter they look for a dun or an officer. They have no ease, and no peace, and no comfort. This is the case with too many of our citizens. The cause should be removed. We can remove causes, if we cannot apply remedies. We have no remedies, except the removal of causes.

In the West, we feel the tariff heaviest, and there it operates most oppressively. In Missouri it is worse than in Illinois; in Illinois, worse than in Indiana; in Indiana, worse than it is in Ohio: in Ohio, worse than in Pennsylvania; in the western part of Pennsylvania, worse than in Philadelphia. In other words, the farther you get from the port of entry, the more onerous will be the operation of the tariff. The profits on a tariff will generally increase in proportion to the length of time which elapses, and the number of hands through which the taxed article passes, between the payment of the tariff at the custom-house by the importer, and the sale of the article to the consumer in the country, who pays the cost, the tariff, the profits on cost, and the profits on tariff, all in a lump. The tariff system, then, operates less heavily upon the importing States than upon the interior and Western States.

The whole operation of the tariff is calculated to give the manufacturing regions advantage over the agricultural. The labor of the agriculturist, and of other classes too, is taxed; and that tax is given to the manufacturer. A constant stream of wealth is thus flowing from the agricultural regions into the manufacturing regions. However slow and imperceptible this operation may be, it will in time have its effect; and that effect will be, to enrich one portion of the Union, by impoverishing the other—to enrich the manufacturing region, at the expense of the agricultural region. The great inducement held out by the high protective character of this tariff, and the utter folly and madness of investing capital in bank stocks, railroads, and other wild and visionary schemes, for the future, will give great encouragement to manufactories. Every description of articles which can be manufactured in our own country at an expense not absolutely unreasonable, will, in a few years, be made in sufficient abundance to supply all our wants, and to exclude the foreign article of the same character altogether. The effect of this will be to cut off the importation of nearly all the goods on which the revenues of the Government are now collected. The list of articles paying no duty under this bill is estimated at $13,000,000. A slight tariff would prohibit the importation of most of these articles. From these, and the remnant of other articles which may be imported, not manufactured in our own country, a sufficiency of revenue cannot be collected to defray the expenses of Government. Then another effect of this tariff will be to cut us out of a revenue from imports. But we must have a revenue to keep the wheels of Government in motion. If we cannot get that revenue by a system of imposts, then we must be driven to some other system. This is necessarily the case; and we cannot help it, except by reducing the tariff, and suffering the importation of more foreign merchandise. To effect this, the reduction would have to be very large. We shall be driven to another system to supply our treasury, and the system of excises is out of the question. We shall have nothing left, then, but a resort to direct taxation. The high tariff will drive us to this system; and this will be another effect of this high protective tariff. It may be fortunate, however, for the country, if this result follows. The system of direct taxation may prove our greatest blessing.

The high tariff is driving us to direct taxation. The withdrawal of capital from the banks, and wild schemes of internal improvements, and the large profits from manufacturing, will cause heavy investments in that business. The great reduction in the amount of the circulating medium will reduce the price of everything; the price of labor must fall, and the price of all the ingredients used in manufacturing must fall; it is not in the power of man to prevent it. This fall in prices will be a protection to the domestic, against the foreign manufactures. The high prices which everything commanded here a few years back made us the market for the balance of the world. We bought lmost everything, and sold nearly nothing. Our resent low prices will reverse the order of things. Ve shall now sell, and measurably cease to buy. Ve shall manufacture extensively, and greatly diminish our imports. Our revenue from imports must then fall.

The result of all this must be to drive us eventually into a system of direct taxation. It is idle and oolish, and worse than madness, to shut our eyes gainst this fact. The day is not far distant, when, o matter how much a majority of us may regret t, we shall be compelled to realize it. And, for my art, I can see no good reason why we should wish o avert that day; or even why we should not welome, instead of dreading its approach. It sometimes happens that apprehended evils prove our reatest blessings; and it may be so with the system f direct taxation.

He is blind who cannot see coming events by the hadows which precede them. He is unwise and owardly who shuts his eyes at what might be een approaching, because he dreads the object. Ve should not shut our eyes against the light hich blazons forth the truth, but should look at ll things as they present themselves, and meet hem fearlessly and manfully. So we should meet his question of direct taxation, to which high prohective tariffs are driving us at a gallopping pace. Vo doubt about it. Our protection enables us to manufacture for ourselves. By manufacturing for urselves, we exclude foreign imports; by excluding oreign imports, we cut off our revenue from imosts; by cutting off our revenue from imposts, we re driven to direct taxation. This is inevitable. Excises are out of the question. The present tariff rill not yield a sufficient revenue for the wants of he Government; it is too high; it will check imortations too far.

If, then, we are to be driven to the system of irect taxation, we should begin to look at that sysem calmly and dispassionately, and like rational nen. It may not be the worst; it may be the est; it has many advocates. It may be the simplest, heapest, and safest system. It cannot be more xpensive than the system of imposts. The exense of collecting direct taxes will, no doubt, be reatly less than that of collecting imposts. We ave before seen that 7½ per cent. was the exense of collecting imposts. This is the amount aid simply for collecting. Then we have seen he profits paid upon the tariff. On the Western eople these profits amount to one hundred and ifty-seven per cent. Many of the States collect heir revenue—by direct taxation too—for less than ven 7 per cent. Then, between the two systems, here is no comparison in the expense of collecting.

But the revenue for this Government, under a ystem of direct taxation, ought to be collected t much less expense than the revenue for the tate Governments. The State of Missouri pays bout $70,000 annually to support her Governent. Her portion of the revenue of this Govrnment is $609,232. The State of Connecticut ays about $80,000 annually for her Government. Her portion of the revenue of this Government s about $600,000. These two cases occur to me t this moment. The other States pay for their wn support, and the support of this Government, n about the same proportion. Let me say this isproportion is immense, and that it is an evilence of the great evil of having a Government oo independent of the people. Our rulers should e kept close to their constituents, and held acountable.

The $70,000 of State revenue paid in Missouri, nd the $609,232 of United States revenue paid n Missouri, are paid by precisely the same peole. If both sums were paid by direct taxes, the ollector of each sum would call upon precisely he same number of men, and the same men. The trouble of collecting the $70,000, then, would e precisely the trouble of collecting the $609,232. Only one difference would exist. In the former ase, it would be less; in the latter, the responsiility would be greater. But this would not be imortant. If the trouble of collecting the two sums would be about the same, then the expense of colecting the two ought to be about the same. Then, f the $70,000 can be collected for about (say) 7 er cent, $609,232 ought to be collected for even ess than one per cent. What a result! Allow even 5 per cent. for the expense of collecting, nd the direct system would still be cheaper than he indirect, omitting the profits on the tariff.

But the value of a system of direct taxes must depend much upon the machinery by which it is managed. The prejudices against the system once in operation, may have had their origin in the imperfections of the laws by which that system was managed. In many instances, this was, no doubt, true. There is surely nothing frightful in the simple fact of knowing that we pay a few dollars to support our Government. In being cheated out of ten times as much, I can see nothing so exquisitely delightful, which should make us cling to a system of indirect taxation. The people will not, when it becomes necessary, refuse to pay taxes directly in proportion to the value of their property. I am sure of this. They are doing this very thing now in almost every State in the Union. They do not complain when the taxes are reasonable and right. If the taxes are too high, the knowledge of that fact is brought to the notice of the people when they are called on to pay; and they correct the evil through their Representatives. This is a decided benefit resulting from this system. It would be a great corrective of abuses and extravagances if applied to this Government.

I can see no difference in principle between paying direct taxes to the State Governments and direct taxes to this Government. The taxes are paid in the same coin; they are levied in the same proportion; they are collected by the same sort of officers. They differ only in amount. We do not complain of State taxes. They are direct. Why, then, complain of taxes for this Government, if they should ever be direct? The people will not complain of them, simply because they are direct; but, if they do complain, it will be of their immense weight. Of this they will be right to complain. But the distinction should be clearly drawn, that this is not a complaint against the system of direct taxation, but against the weight of the taxes themselves.

In the West, (unless my system of calculating be incorrect,) there would be an immense saving to the people, by exchanging the indirect for the direct system of taxation. We should save, first, the difference between the expense of collecting—say four or five per cent.; and we should save, second, all the profits on the indirect taxes, which amount, as far west as Missouri, to 157 per cent. In this State, we should then pay, simply, $609,232 of taxes; and from this would be deducted 1 per cent. (and perhaps something upwards) for collecting, instead of 7½ per cent. Under the direct system, we should pay the $609,232, without paying any profits on it; instead of paying $958,922 profits, as we now do, under the indirect system. The same observations apply to other States—if not in the same proportion, at least to a great extent.

I have said that the people would not object to pay direct taxes when it became necessary to do so, if they were reasonable and right. They pay direct taxes to the States, and do not complain; and this is in no way different from paying direct taxes to this Government. But the people of Missouri pay only about $70,000 of taxes for State purposes, and $609,232 for this Government. Connecticut pays but about $80,000 for State purposes, and about $600,000 to this Government. The people of Missouri, although accustomed to pay $70,000 State revenue annually, and by direct taxes, might be somewhat astounded when called on for $609,232 in direct taxes. And Connecticut, accustomed to pay only about $80,000, would be somewhat astounded when called on to pay $600,000 in the shape of direct taxes. It is urged as an argument against direct taxation, that the people would repudiate when they discovered the amount they had to pay. The exposure of the burdens heaped on the shoulders of the people is the best argument in favor of direct taxes. They would repudiate—not the Government, nor the system of taxation; but the expenses and extravagance of the Government. When we are driven to direct taxation, a full exposure of these burdens will follow; and then every man will learn what he has to pay towards supporting his Government; and then, and probably not till then, will commence a proper system of reform and retrenchment in this Government. This exposure should be made. We should perpetuate no mysteries in our Government. Everything should be laid bare to the people. The light of day should be thrown on everything.

It is urged against direct taxes, and in favor of indirect taxes, that a man may escape the latter if he chooses. Let no man deceive himself by supposing that he eludes the taxes because they are indirect. If he neither eats, drinks, works with tools, nor wears any clothes, then he may escape them; but if he wears clothes, works, drinks, or eats, he is apt to pay his part of the taxes. Every man, woman, and child in the land, of every age, color, and sex, is taxed under this bill. Our horses, our cattle, our sheep—everything using salt is taxed under this bill. We pay the tax on our salt, on our coffee, on our sugar, on our tea, on our hats, our boots, our shoes, our coats, our shirts; on our hoes, on our ploughs, on our axes, on our spades; on almost everything we use, we pay this tax; and we should never forget the profits we pay on this tax. Let no man, if any be so mean and so ignoble as to wish to avoid his share of tax, deceive himself by supposing he escapes this tax, unless it be the manufacturer, who uses his own, and not the imported article. The manufacturer does escape, so far as he consumes his own article; but no further.

It may be wrong to answer such an argument as this. If any, there can be but few men in our Government who would be willing to escape paying their quota of taxes. No man should be so unpatriotic as to wish to escape the payment of the taxes justly due the Government which protects his life, his liberty, and his property. Every man should be proud to pay the reasonable taxes due his Government; and every man of proud and patriotic heart will do so. He is an ignoble son who would skulk from his just share of the burdens of his country, at any time, or of any kind. We should banish, but never encourage or countenance, such an idea. The people will not repudiate. They are too patriotic for that. They would demand a correction of abuses, and enforce a reduction of expenditures. This would be right.

The increase of Executive patronage is urged against direct taxes. This is no objection to the system, because it does not necessarily exist. An increase of patronage is easily avoided; and a great diminution in the amount of patronage now exercised, as easily effected. The Executive patronage would only be increased by giving him the power of appointing the assessors and collectors of the revenue. It would be wrong to give him this power; and he would find no pleasure in exercising it. Each State has her collection districts already organized. This Government could adopt the same districts. In some of the States, the people of the collection districts, or counties, now elect their own assessors and collectors. This plan is found to work well. It is the Democratic plan; and all parties are now Democratic. It is the best plan, and this Government should adopt it. This would cut off all Executive patronage, and obviate that objection. If we should ever collect the whole of our revenue by direct taxes—and when we are driven to that system, it will be best to do so to avoid the expense of keeping up two systems—then we can dispense with the whole custom-house establishment, and all the fraud and corruption connected with it. This would cut off from the Executive the appointment of the host of custom house officers, while it would cleanse the Government of a rotten system of taxation. And this would be an immense curtailment of Executive patronage.

The election of assessors and collectors provides for the collection of the revenue. Nothing is more simple, and plain, and easy of comprehension. We see it every day at home. The balance of the system is carried out easily. Nothing remains, after collecting, but to pay the money out according to the order of the Government. The custom-houses are scattered all over the Union, and so are the revenues under the system of imposts. Under a system of direct taxes, the collectors will be scattered all over the Union, and so will be the revenue collected by them. In either case, this Government has to provide the means of transmitting her funds to the proper points. The mail belongs to this Government; every man in the community transmits his money by mail; so could the collectors of the revenue. The Government should take the risk of her own conveyance. If this would not do, this Government could have a depository in each State. Either plan would be simple and cheap, and the details easily arranged.

There are many reasons in favor of a system of direct taxation. My mind has been impelled in that direction for years, and by a force which has thus far been utterly irresistible. I have endeavored to combat it; but so strong have been the arguments in its favor, that I have been unable to do so. I differ from many of my political friends on this subject; and from many, and perhaps a majority, of my constituents; but it cannot be helped. I believe the system of direct taxation the simplest, cheapest, and safest, and decidedly the best. But I believe my constituents are not with me on this point; and I must represent their wishes, when they can be ascertained or reasonably calculated on. But when the time arrives for the adoption of a system of direct taxation,—as at present advised, if that system be properly arranged, I shall cheerfully vote for it; and it is right that I should say so. I have no right to speak for anybody else; but for myself, I have a right to speak. It is my duty to speak, because I differ from my friends, and perhaps a majority of my constituents. I would rather sink, sustaining correct principles, than swim by advocating errors. I cannot help believing the system of direct taxation the best for us.

We have seen the evils heaped upon us by the indirect mode of taxation. We have seen its unequal operation, and its expensive and oppressive character. We have seen the immense accumulation of profits upon the tariff, all of which are paid by the consumers. We have seen the tendency of any tariff, and especially of a high protective tariff, to drive us to direct taxation. We have seen that the system of direct taxation would relieve us from many of the burdens imposed on us by the tariff. All this we have seen; but this relief is remote, and we want immediate relief. There are some remedies within our reach, and we should begin to use them. They are simple, and should be adopted at once.

One remedy for the Western people is to import their own goods, as far as possible, directly to the Western cities. We ought to cut off the profit to the Eastern importer and to the jobber; and to reduce the profits of the Western city merchant to that of the jobber; and that of the village or country merchant, to that of the Western city merchant. Even this would leave us ten, twenty, and thirty per cent.—enough, in all conscience, for any people to pay; ten to the Western importer, twenty to the city merchant, and thirty to the country merchant. Even these ought to be reduced one half. They might be. The merchandise being close at home, our village and country merchants could invest and sell, and reinvest and sell again, at very short periods. We should pay cash, and sell for cash. Then there would be no losses; and the merchants could live and thrive upon half the profits they now contract for. The practice of charging solvent persons double price, to make up losses on insolvent persons, might then be abandoned. By importing our own goods, we should promote the growth of our own cities. What the people of my own State now contribute to the growth of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, we should then contribute to the growth, and improvement, and wealth of our own rising and flourishing city. So of all the other Western people, and the other Western cities. They would become better markets for our own Western produce; and better markets would enrich our citizens. Our citizens, enriched, would be able to purchase more from our merchants; and thus each class would promote the interest of the other, and all would prosper together. This remedy would save us a large amount of the profits which accumulate on the tariff and on the cost of merchandise also.

In the West we should ask a tariff as low as possible. Let it be for revenue. We can pay the tariff, if moderate, and the profits on it; and we have paid a tariff, when exorbitant, and the profits on that; but then it is wrong to grind us too far into the earth. We are sore already. You should tread lightly on our corns, and not render our burdens insupportable, but begin "to unpack." Let the Government be administered economically; and load us with no more revenue than is necessary to pay her reasonable expenses. Abolish expenses where they can be dispensed with; and, where they cannot, retrench them if they can bear retrenchment. Cut off all extravagancies, whether in large matters or in small. Let us not be afraid of mighty influence against us, where large expenditures are involved. Let us meet them and retrench. Let us not slur over the strong and the powerful, and strike deep into the weak and the helpless. Let us not pass by the army and the navy, and seize upon the clerks and the pages. Let all fare alike. Let all be brought to a standard to suit the times. Money has grown scarce among us. It may be many years before it is plentiful again. The people cannot pay as they have paid heretofore. We must come down. Necessity will force us; and we had better make a virtue of necessity, and come at once where it must eventually drive us. Reduce this bill. You will get more revenue by it. Even then you will not get enough. The people are too poor; they are too much in debt; they cannot buy your taxed goods; they must economize to get out of debt. Let us retrench. Then we shall want less revenue, and the Government will be better able to meet her debts.

But, in my own State we have another remedy, and we should adopt it. We should go for protecting home industry. We have the power of making a large portion of the necessaries of life within ourselves, and we should exercise that power. We should resolve to do so in self-defence. We should do so, to prevent ourselves from being taxed to death to support exacting neighbors. We should keep our own wheels and our own looms in operation. We should give them especial protection and encouragement. We should encourage our other various manufactures. Our men, women, and children should work, and keep at it busily and steadily, and should husband well what they make; and should live, as far as possible, within themselves, until a change in the policy of our Government shall equalize its advantages, its burdens, and its taxes.

In my own State, we should encourage manufactures. No doubt we have the power to do so. We have advantages over our Eastern neighbors. Our fuel, water-power, house rent, provisions, and raw material for some fabrics, can be obtained decidedly cheaper than theirs. Our manual labor is dearer. But to make coarse cottons, for example, (an article used extensively among us,) very little manual labor is required. They are mostly made with machinery. For this, and other reasons, they can be made as cheap in Massachusetts as in Great Britain; and for this, and other reasons, they ought to be made as cheap in Missouri as in Massachusetts. The other reasons, in both cases, are the cheap prices of all the ingredients, except manual labor. This would cost us but little.

We should take back the lands. For the present, this would be another remedy. The revenue derived from them would go, to that extent, to diminish the burdens of a tariff. It would go much further. It would save the people the payment of that much revenue; and then all the profits paid upon that amount of revenue. Suppose the land fund to be distributed be $2,000,000: if we distribute $2,000,000 of land revenue, the treasury will be minus that sum in consequence; and just as much so as if we had distributed $2,000,000 of revenue from imposts. To the clearness of this proposition nobody will hesitate to assent. Of this sum, the distributive share of Missouri would be $45,000; and perhaps more—no matter what amount. Before you give this amount of land revenue to the State, you must take it from the treasury of the United States. In doing this, you create a vacancy in your treasury exactly equal to $45,000, which must be filled up from some other source. We have but one source; and that is from the customs—from imposts—from taxes on imported goods. Everybody can understand this. Let us trace the operation of this on Missouri. Forty-five thousand dollars are to be collected from the customs, or imposts—or, in plainer language, taxes on imported goods—to supply her share of the deficit in the revenue created by the distribution of the land fund. This sum is paid at the custom-houses; and mostly at those in New York and Philadelphia, where we buy most of our merchandise. This forty-five thousand dollar tax is paid in the outset by the importer.

Let us now follow this sum, and the profits which accumulate on it, until the tax, and all the profits on the tax, are finally paid by the consumer. The goods on which this tax is paid must pass through the hands of the importer, the jobber, the Western city merchant, and the village or country merchant, as in other cases. The importer sells to the jobber, and gets 10 per cent. on the tariff which he has paid. This raises the whole sum to $49,500. The jobber sells to the St. Louis merchant, and he gets 20 per cent. upon the tariff and the profit which he has paid the importer. This raises the whole sum to $59,400. The St. Louis merchant sells to the village or country merchant, and charges a profit of 30 per cent. This raises the whole amount of tariff and profits on tariff to $77,220. The village or country merchant sells to the people who consume, and charges 50 per cent. profit. This, added to the tariff, and previous profits on tariff, makes the $45,000 cost the consumers $115,830! The operation of the land fund then, on Missouri, is to give her $45,000 with one hand, and to take from her $115,830 with the other. Let us say nothing about the expense of collecting and distributing: this out of the question, the picture is strong enough to startle any Western man who can be induced to look at it in his senses, and made to understand it. We should get back the lands, then. The revenue arising from them would go, to their amount, to relieve the Western people of the burdens imposed on them in collecting the revenues for this Government.

But all these remedies will not give the West complete relief. All these remedies will not place the West on an equality with other parts of the Union. We shall not have a complete remedy, nor shall we be placed on an equality in paying taxes, till we have been driven to direct taxation, and have exterminated the impost system. Then we shall pay clean taxes and equal taxes. Then we shall know how much we pay, what we pay it for, and what is done with what we pay. And there will be a great advancement in our system of collecting and disbursing revenue, and in reforming the abuses and retrenching the expenses of the Government.

[The following speech was made at the 2d session of the 27th Congress, as will be seen by its date; but it was not written out by the member and delivered to us until after the Appendix for that session was completed, which will account for its appearance in this volume.]

SPEECH OF MR. J. C. EDWARDS,
OF MISSOURI,

In the House of Representatives, July 20, 1848—

In relation to the territory in dispute between the State of Missouri and the United States, and to the true location of the boundary between Missouri and Iowa.

Mr. EDWARDS addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: But one hour will be allowed me to present my case. That is by no means enough; and two would not be sufficient to investigate the subject fully; but as much of it as can be, shall be crowded into the time allowed me.

I am not ignorant of the fact that I commence the discussion of this case with a majority of the House prejudiced against the claim of my State. I can, therefore, anticipate the character of the decision which will probably be given. You have heard that side of the case against the claim of Missouri; but you have heard nothing in favor of her claim; and even now, under the operation of your rules, you will let but half the case be presented before you decide.

I infer that you are prejudiced against our claim for several reasons. One report has been made upon the subject by the authority of Iowa. This is, of course, against the claim of Missouri. Another has been made by a commissioner on the part of the United States. This does not decide positively against us, but its leanings and tendencies are against us. The Committee on Territories, to whom this matter has been referred, have twice reported against our claim. During all this time you have heard nothing favorable to the claim of Missouri. For these reasons, in part, I infer that you are prejudiced against our claim.

But Iowa considers herself a party to this case. Then her report is of no great value, and should have but little weight. Your own commissioner does not decide positively against us. He acted on but a part of the case, and still had his doubts. The two reports of the Committee on Territories are by no means consistent—the one admitting what the other denies, in several important matters. But you depend much upon your committees—and, in the general, this is right and proper; but your committees are not always right in their conclusions. They are by no means infallible. In this case, they are clearly wrong.

You are a party to this case. This is usually a cause of prejudice; but I do not allude to the fact here for that reason; but because I wish the fact distinctly noticed that you are a party. If it be a ground of prejudice, we are willing to waive the ground, and to trust our case to your decision, reserving to ourselves the right, of course, as is done in all other cases of similar character, to apply nother tribunal if your decision be against us. ut we wish to be saved the necessity of going to nother tribunal; and we invoke your justice and our magnanimity, and ask you to save us that ecessity, by giving us a decision according to the w and the facts of the case.

The Committee on Territories admits that this estion, "so far as the rights of Missouri are in-olved, is peculiarly for the judgment of the courts; it the authorities, both of the State and Territory, ave repeatedly referred it to Congress, and be-ught its decision. The action of the National egislature cannot conclude Missouri, but it will binding on Iowa, though it should concede some-hing of her rights to her adversary in this con-oversy." See page 11, doc. 791, 2d sess. 27th ong. This opinion, advanced by the committee, clearly right. I am, therefore, saved the neces-ty of proving this point.

This is not a case in which Missouri is one party nd Iowa the other. Iowa is not directly a party the case at all. It is a case in which the State Missouri is one party, and the United States the her. The territory in dispute belongs to the ate of Missouri, or else it belongs to the United ates. If it belongs to the State, you have no wer over it; if it does not belong to the State, then u can do what you please with it. That speck it which does not already belong to the Indians, u can sell even to them to-morrow, if you choose, the territory be yours, and not ours. If it be not rs, you have complete control over it, and you ill continue to have till Iowa becomes a State, nd then you can give it to her if you choose. wa expects to get it, and for this reason is inter-ted in your retaining it. This is all the interest e has in the case.

The case is one, then, of singular character: the ate is one party, and you are the other party; and e the State asks you to decide the matter. And ot exactly to decide the matter either. We call on you, rather to settle it; and you have the power do so. We say the territory is ours, and not yours. e call upon you to acknowledge our right to terri-ry which we claim to be our own, and to renounce our claim to territory to which we contend you ve no title. If you refuse to do so, this does not event us from applying to the courts of justice. his is the nature of the case.

The boundary in dispute is that between the State Missouri and the Territory of Iowa—being the rthern boundary of the former, and the southern undary of the latter. The State of Missouri in-sts upon a line which runs with the parallel of titude passing through the rapids of the river es Moines, at the Great Bend in said river. The ommittee on Territories insists that the true undary runs through the "Des Moines rapids," the Mississippi river; but as this line would cut ep into our counties, the committee, out of abun-nt mercy to the State, agrees to give us the old dian boundary line run by John C. Sullivan in 16, four years before the State Government was rmed. This line runs much nearer to the one aimed by Missouri than that which the commit-e says is the true line. But the committee says is Indian line is not, and cannot be, the true line. his is an admission, at once, that they have not cided the case according to the law and the facts. et them not say that they have done us more an justice. We understand that, and will inquire to it.

The territory in dispute—that lying between these o lines—the line claimed by Missouri and the d Indian line—at the eastern end, next the Des loines river, is over eight, and less than nine iles wide; and at the western end, next the Mis-uri river, about thirteen miles wide. The whole rritory in dispute embraces about 2,616 square iles. Of this tract of country, about one-six-enth, being about nine miles average in width, r an average of about eighteen miles in length, ontaining about four and a half congressional wnships, and a population of 1,500 or 2,000 per-ons, has been ceded by the Indians to the United tates. This one-sixteenth your committee magni-es into "near one-third of the territory now in dis-ute." But this is by no means their largest blun-er. The remaining fifteen-sixteenths of the dis-uted territory are still in possession of the Indians, nd have no population to be affected by the ulti-ate decision of this case.

The people already in the disputed territory went here with a full knowledge of the existence of this ontroversy; and, of course, with a determination to abide the result. In fact, many of them may have gone with the hope and the expectation that this country was part of the State of Missouri. But, no matter what they expected, you should decide this case, not as a question of expediency, but according to the law and the facts of the case. Any other decision must be unjust, and cannot be submitted to by Missouri.

In the progress of this discussion, we should bear in mind an important distinction between a Territory and a State. The former is a sort of preparatory grade of government. The latter is a complete and perfect government. The jurisdiction of the former is fixed by this Government; and may be altered or changed, enlarged or diminished, at any moment, by Congress. The jurisdiction of the latter is fixed, in the case of Missouri, by the State constitution, and cannot be changed or altered, enlarged or diminished, by Congress. The territory of the former is fixed by an act of Congress, and can be enlarged or curtailed by Congress. The territory of the latter is fixed by the Constitution, and cannot be enlarged or diminished by an act of Congress.

The 6th day of March, 1820, Congress passed an act authorizing the people of Missouri Territory to form a constitution and State Government. This act prescribed boundaries for the State to be formed. The 19th day of June, 1820, nearly four months afterwards, the people of Missouri Territory formed a constitution and State Government. This constitution defined the boundaries of the "State of Missouri." That section of the act of Congress which describes the boundaries of the Territory, and that article of the constitution of the State which describes the boundaries of the State, are in the same words.* It is a curious and an interesting question of law, that, notwithstanding both these instruments use the same words in describing the boundaries, yet it becomes necessary, in deciding this case, to determine whether the act of Congress or the constitution of the State is the paramount instrument; whether the act of Congress or the constitution of the State gives boundaries to the State.

The question, whether the act or the constitution is the controlling instrument, becomes important, because the great difficulty in settling this controversy grows out of a latent ambiguity, both in the act of Congress and in the constitution of the State; and this difficulty is increased by an attempt to enlarge this ambiguity. The ambiguity consists in the expression, "the rapids of the river Des Moines," used both in the act of Congress and in the constitution of the State. We have no evidence that, when the constitution was adopted, more than one rapid of the river Des Moines was known; but, by late surveys, we ascertain that there are several "rapids of the river Des Moines;" and the difficulty now consists in determining which of these "rapids of the river Des Moines" were called for in the act of Congress and the constitution of the State. The enlargement of the ambiguity—and which, beyond all question, is a very absurd one—consists in an attempt to make the "rapids of the river Des Moines" mean the "Des Moines rapids" in the Mississippi river. Let me here say, that three miles above the mouth of the Des Moines river commences a chain of rapids in the Mississippi river, which extends up that river fourteen miles. These, from their proximity to the mouth of the Des Moines river, and to distinguish them from other rapids in the Mississippi above, are called the "Des Moines rapids," and have been so called for ages. The first rapids of any note in the Des Moines river itself are about sixty miles above the mouth of that river.

This ambiguity, like other latent ambiguities, can be explained by parol testimony. If the act of Congress and the constitution of the State refer to the same "rapids," then the explanation of the one is the explanation of the other, and the testimony of the same witnesses would explain both. But your committee decides that the act of Congress calls for one "rapids," and we contend that the constitution of the State calls for another "rapids;" and if this be so, then the explanation of the one will not be the explanation of the other; and it will, consequently, become necessary to decide which is the governing instrument—which is to be explained, the act or the constitution.

This explanation can be given only by those who passed the act and the constitution, and those who were otherwise connected with the passage of these instruments. If the act of Congress be the controlling instrument, then the explanation must come from members of Congress, and those connected with the proceedings of Congress about the time the act was passed; but if the constitution of the State be the controlling instrument, then the explanation must come from the members of the convention which framed the constitution, and those connected with the proceedings of that convention. It is hardly probable that anybody else knows or recollects anything about either of them; and these instruments can be explained in no other way. It is probable that no member of Congress recollects anything about the meaning of the act, except the delegate from the Territory of Missouri himself. It is highly probable that no member of Congress, except the delegate referred to, knew anything, at the time the act was passed, about the boundaries. At this time Florida is applying for admission; and yet I am sure not one member in this House, when she is admitted into the Union, will understand her entire boundaries. Her delegate probably will. It was still more so the case with Missouri. The delegate himself from that Territory says he was unacquainted with the country.

We must have the testimony of those who know what was intended by the ambiguous phrase. Without that, a correct decision of this controversy cannot well be given. It is entirely competent to explain the ambiguity by parol testimony. The Committee on Territories, in their argument against us, have followed this course. They have resorted to a letter of Pierre Chouteau, the case of Louis Honore, and other evidence, to prove that an American Congress, removed a thousand miles from any French influence, had used the expression "rapids of the river Des Moines," when they meant the "Des Moines rapids," in the Mississippi river, simply because the French called the latter "rapides de la rivière Des Moines." Just here, however, as it suited their purposes, the committee may have intended to treat the constitution as the controlling instrument, and to lay the act of Congress aside for awhile. That constitution was made among the French at St. Louis; and, although the convention was almost to a man English, yet it might be a little Frenchified. But the committee should take the act of Congress for their guide altogether; or else should drop it, and take the constitution altogether; and not one, and then the other, as it may suit their convenience. But the committee introduces parol testimony, and you are acting on it. I claim the same right, and shall exercise it. But the question is yet to be settled whether the act or the constitution is to control, and which is to be explained. Let us now examine that question, and then we will introduce our evidence.

The act of Congress "authorizing the people of Missouri Territory to form a constitution and State Government" was passed on the 6th day of March, 1820. The constitution of the State was "ordained and established" the 19th day of July, 1820—the same year—three months and upwards after the passage of the act aforesaid. The second day of March, 1821—four days less than one year after the passage of the act of March 6th—Congress passed a resolution providing "that Missouri shall be admitted into the Union on an equal

*The boundaries of "Missouri Territory," as described in the act of Congress approved March 6, 1820, and of the "State of Missouri," as described in the constitution of said State, adopted July 19, 1820, are described in the following words:

"Beginning in the middle of the Mississippi river, on the parallel of 36 degrees of north latitude; thence west, along the said parallel of latitude, to the St. Francis river; thence up and following the course of that river, in the middle of the main channel thereof, to the parallel of latitude of 36 degrees and 30 minutes; thence west, along the same, to a point where the said parallel is intersected by a meridian line passing through the middle of the mouth of the Kansas river, where the same empties into the Missouri river; thence, from the point aforesaid, north, along the said meridian line, to the intersection of the parallel of latitude which passes through THE RAPIDS OF THE RIVER DES MOINES, making the said line correspond with the Indian boundary line; thence east, from the point of intersection last aforesaid, along the said parallel of latitude, to the middle of the channel of the main fork of the said river Des Moines; thence, down and along the middle of the main channel of the said river Des Moines, to the mouth of the same, where it empties into the Mississippi river; thence, due east, to the middle of the main channel of the Mississippi river; thence down and following the course of the Mississippi river, in the middle of the main channel thereof, to the place of beginning."

[NOTE.—The act of Congress and the constitution of the State, so far as they describe the boundaries, are in the same words, with this difference: In the constitution, the words "the said" are used for the word "that" in the act; and the words "of" and "and" in the act, are dropped in the constitution; but this is immaterial, and does not change the boundaries.]

footing with the original States."* The act of March 6, 1820, and the resolution of March 2, 1821, being each of them acts of Congress, are of equal dignity. The latter, by admitting Missouri into the Union, sanctions the constitution of that State; and thus recognises that constitution as being of equal dignity, also. If the three instruments be of equal dignity, and any of their provisions clash, then the latter must control the former, under the general rule that, when laws conflict, the latter must govern the former. If the boundaries prescribed in the act of Congress differ from the boundaries prescribed in the constitution, then the latter must govern the former, and must give boundaries to the State.

The Territory of Missouri was one thing—the State of Missouri is another thing. The Territory existed under an act—the work of Congress. The State exists under a constitution—the work of a convention. The Territory of Missouri received its boundaries under different acts of Congress, and these boundaries were at one time larger, and at another time less. They were least under the last act. The State of Missouri received her boundaries from her constitution, afterwards sanctioned by an act of Congress; and these boundaries remain the same, so far as this controversy involves them. The Territory of Missouri was not admitted into the Union. A Territory cannot become a member of the Confederacy. The State of Missouri was admitted into the Union. A State can become a member of the Confederacy. It was not the Territory, but the State, which was admitted into the Union; and, if it was not the Territory which was admitted into the Union, then the act of Congress does not give boundaries to the State, because the act of Congress only describes the boundaries of the Territory; but, if it was the State which was admitted into the Union, then the constitution does give the boundaries, because that instrument describes the boundaries of the State thus admitted.

The act of Congress did not describe the boundaries of a State. It could not do so, because the State did not then exist. The act described a certain tract of country, and authorized the people of that country to form a constitution and State government. I admit that the act provided "that the said State shall consist of all the territory included within the following boundaries," and that it then went on to describe the boundaries for a State. But the convention had a right to adopt different boundaries in forming the State; and, although Congress had prescribed boundaries, and had the power to do so, yet she had a right to waive her boundaries, and to adopt those prescribed by the convention. In this case, if there be any difference between the boundaries prescribed by the act and the constitution, then Congress has, by admitting Missouri into the Union, sanctioned the latter, and waived the former—has given up the boundaries as prescribed in the act, and has assented to those prescribed in the constitution. If so, the constitution governs the boundaries, and not the act.

The act of Congress was merely directory. The people of the Territory were not obliged to follow it. They had the right to choose boundaries for their own State, and to ask Congress to grant them those boundaries. Their selection of boundaries amounted to nothing more than a mere choice, without the sanction of Congress, afterwards obtained. It gave them no right to the boundaries selected by themselves, because the land belonged to the United States. But the convention had the right to describe the boundaries, and Congress had the right to say you shall have those boundaries. The convention did prescribe the boundaries, and Congress did say you shall have those boundaries. This settled the matter. Congress gave up the boundaries when she admitted the State of Missouri into the Union. She admitted the State of Missouri, not the Territory. There is no State of Missouri but that described in the constitution of the State. It consists of that tract of country bounded by the constitution of that State. The act of Congress describes a Territory, and does not describe a State. The constitution, then, must control, and not the act.

I admit the lands belonged to the United States. No question of that. Congress had the right to give or withhold them. No doubt of that. She had the right to say to the people about to form a State, you shall take these boundaries, and you shall have no others. If the people then adopted different boundaries, Congress had a right to say, we will not admit you into the Union, because you have not taken the boundaries we gave you. You have adopted boundaries different from those we prescribed for you. You must remodel your State before we can admit you into the Union. You must change the boundaries, and make them correspond with those we prescribed for you, before we can admit you. This Congress could have done. But if Congress chooses to admit the State, as she clearly has the power to do, although the State has adopted boundaries different from those which Congress has prescribed for her, this admission settles the question of boundaries in favor of the constitution, and forever puts that matter to rest. If, then, the boundaries prescribed in the act of Congress and in the constitution of the State be different, then the boundaries prescribed in the constitution are the true ones.

Congress prescribed boundaries in the act, but it is not absolutely certain that the people of the Territory adopted these boundaries. If the act and the constitution differ in reference to them, then the people of the Territory did not adopt them. The people adopted only the boundaries prescribed in constitution. To make the boundaries permanent, it required the assent of the people of the Territory, as well as of Congress. The convention gave her assent to the boundaries prescribed in the constitution, by the adoption of that constitution. Congress gave her assent, also, to the boundaries prescribed in the constitution, by admitting the State into the Union. These boundaries, then, have the assent of both parties. If so, and the boundaries in the act have not, then the boundaries in the constitution are the true ones, and the constitution controls the act.

But Congress did not admit Missouri into the Union, except "on a certain condition." This condition was, not that Missouri should change any part of her boundaries, or surrender any part of the boundaries which the convention had prescribed in her constitution, or any part of the territory included in those boundaries. There was no condition of this character. The State was admitted without any objection to boundaries whatever. No exception was taken to the constitution, in any other than that one condition. The only condition annexed was, that "no law should be passed in conformity" to a certain provision of the constitution, "by which any citizen of either of the States of this Union shall be excluded from the enjoyment of any of the privileges and immunities to which such citizen is entitled under the Constitution of the United States!"* Every other part of the constitution was sanctioned by Congress, that prescribing boundaries and all. The exception to one part amounted to a sanction of the others.

If any other name than Missouri had been adopted by the convention, it would be less difficult to separate the State from the Territory—less difficult to show that it was the State which was admitted into the Union, and not the Territory. The act of Congress authorizes the people of the Territory "to assume such name as they shall deem proper." But this was useless. They had the power as full without the grant of it. But if Congress had required the people to call the State Missouri, and they had adopted a constitution, and in that had called the State Osage, or Gasconade, or Nodaway, or Des Moines, or any other name, and Congress had admitted the State into the Union with that name, most clearly, after the admission, the State would have been entitled to that name, and could not have been called Missouri, as required by the act of Congress. In giving the name, then, the constitution, with the subsequent sanction of Congress, would have controlled the previous action of Congress. So with the boundaries.

Congress admitted the State of Missouri into the Union "on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever." This is the language of the resolution admitting the State into the Union, omitting the condition. The State of Missouri shall be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States. Let us inquire on what footing the "original States" stood when Missouri was admitted. So far as jurisdiction was concerned, they exercised complete jurisdiction over all the territory within their limits, as prescribed in their constitutions. If Missouri, then, stands on an equal footing with "the original States," she, too, has the right to exercise complete jurisdiction throughout her limits, as prescribed in her constitution. If so, her constitution controls the previous act of Congress, and gives the boundaries.

As before said, the act of Congress was merely directory, and not binding on the people of the Territory. They had the right to reject the boundaries prescribed in the act of Congress, or to adopt them, as they saw proper; but, till the people did adopt them, they formed no part of the boundaries of the State. The State itself could have no existence till the people did adopt them, or some other boundaries, to make the State. Congress has no power to form a State. A State must be formed by the people who inhabit the Territory of which it is to be composed. Congress cannot give a single feature to a State, without the assent of the people of that State. She can neither fix the name nor the boundaries, nor any other feature of the State, without the concurrence of the people. She can assent or dissent to what is done, but no more. If the name, the boundaries, the constitution generally, do not suit her, she can refuse admission. But if she admits, she adopts all. Her power is then at an end, and the State constitution controls her previous legislation.

I am not sure that I can make this matter plainer. If, however, the constitution of a State describes one Territory, and Congress admits another Territory into the Union, that is no admission of the State, and that State is still out of the Union. Congress must admit the Territory described in the constitution of the State, if so described at all, else the State is not admitted. If this be so, it is because the constitution gives boundaries to the State, with the assent of Congress, and not the act of Congress, without the assent of the people. If an act of Congress describes one tract of country for a State, and the constitution describes another tract of country for that State, and Congress admits the State created by that constitution into the Union, then she admits her with the boundaries prescribed by her constitution, and not those prescribed by any act of Congress. The admission is a sanction of the boundaries prescribed in the constitution, and a waiver of any boundaries prescribed in an act of Congress.

We have the right to admit Texas, or we have the right to admit one-half of Texas, into the Union. If Congress should pass an act to admit one-half of Texas into the Union, and should prescribe the boundaries of that one-half, and Texas should "form a constitution and State government," embracing the whole of her territory, instead of but one-half, and should call that government "the State of Texas," and Congress should then admit "the State of Texas" into the Union, that would be an admission of the whole country described in the constitution of "the State of Texas," and not of the one-half, as described in the act of Congress. If this be so, it is because the constitution of the State, with the assent of Congress, gives boundaries to the State; and not the act of Congress without the assent of the State.

If an act of Congress gives one limit, and the constitution of a State assumes another, this may form a good reason for not admitting a State into the Union till she changes her boundaries; but, after the State is once admitted, the question as to boundary is settled in favor of the constitution of the State, not to be altered without the consent of both

Extract from the resolution admitting Missouri into the Union.

"That Missouri shall be admitted into this Union, on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever, upon the fundamental condition that the fourth clause of the twenty-sixth section of the third article of the constitution, submitted on the part of said State to Congress, shall never be construed to authorize the passage of any law, and that no law shall be passed in conformity thereto, by which any citizen of either of the States of this Union shall be excluded from the enjoyment of the privileges and immunities to which such citizen is entitled under the Constitution of the United States."

[Approved, March 2, 1821.

*This resolution required the Legislature of the State, by "a solemn public act," to assent to this fundamental condition. The Legislature acted under the constitution of the State. They had no power, except what they derived from that constitution, and could exercise no other. They had no power to change the constitution, except in the manner pointed out by that instrument; and that was not by "a solemn public act," but by an amendment supported by two-thirds of each branch of the Legislature, at two successive sessions. If this "condition" was to effect anything, it was to effect a change in the constitution; but the Legislature could not effect a change in the constitution in that way. They complied with the condition imposed by Congress, but that condition amounts to nothing more than if Congress had required me to comply with it. The Legislature had no power to assent in that way. Then no legal assent was given. An illegal assent is a nullity. The "solemn public act" is then a solemn mockery. But the condition imposed being complied with, the President, by proclamation, declared the admission of Missouri into the Union to be complete. Her admission was complete; and she came into the Union with her constitution untouched and unaltered.

parties. Congress can say, We will not admit you into the Union with that territory or those boundaries; but, after admitting a State, she cannot say, You shall not have that territory or those boundaries. It is then too late. By the admission, Congress sanctions all.

If the constitution altered the boundaries prescribed by the act, Congress clearly had the right to adopt the altered boundaries. A case has occurred since the admission of Missouri into the Union, precisely in point. The State of Missouri changed her constitution so as to alter one part of her boundary, and Congress sanctioned this alteration; and the boundary thus changed is now the permanent boundary of the State. If the State, by altering her constitution, and with the sanction of Congress, could change her boundary recently; surely, by the adoption of her constitution, and with the sanction of Congress, when she was just coming into existence, she could change a mere direction of Congress to adopt certain boundaries.

The "State of Florida" is now applying for admission into the Union. No act of Congress has been passed to authorize her to form a constitution and State Government; and yet she has done so, and is now applying for admission. Surely no one can doubt the power of Congress to admit her. An act of Congress authorizing the people of a Territory to form a constitution and a State Government, is by no means a requisite indispensable preparatory to the admission of a State into the Union. We should act a silly part if we were to pass a law to authorize Texas to form a constitution and State Government, preparatory to her admission into the Union; and yet, if she were to apply to-morrow, with her present republican form of Government, we should, beyond all dispute, have the power at once to admit her. She has her existence as a State, independent of the action of Congress; so has Florida, and so had Missouri; and each of these Governments became a State by virtue of its own constitution, and not by virtue of any act of Congress. Congress did not make them States. They made themselves so. All Congress can do, is to give her assent, or enter her dissent, to what they have done, and to admit or reject them when they apply for admission into the Union.

The act of Congress, then, of the 6th of March, 1820, does not prescribe the boundaries of the State of Missouri. The constitution formed by the convention the 19th day of July, 1820, and sanctioned by Congress the 2d day of March, 1821, does prescribe the boundaries of the State. Then, if the first act of Congress prescribed one set of boundaries, and the constitution of the State prescribes another set of boundaries, the constitution controls the boundaries, and not the act of Congress; and the ambiguity in the constitution of the State is to be explained, and not the ambiguity in the act of Congress; and the witnesses to explain are the members of the convention, and those connected with the proceedings of the convention at the time the constitution was adopted, and not the members of Congress, and those connected with the proceedings of Congress, at the time the act of Congress was passed. Then we can proceed with our evidence.

Let it be remembered that the northern boundary of Missouri was to run through a country then a wilderness, and but little known. The northern boundary was to run upon "the parallel of latitude which passes through the rapids of the river Des Moines." "The rapids of the river Des Moines" is the ambiguous phrase in the constitution, as well as in the act of Congress. To explain this, I shall introduce the evidence of a number of the surviving members of the convention which framed the constitution, and of all who have been heard from. I shall also introduce the evidence of General William Milburn, who was at the time a clerk in the surveyor general's office, and who has been in the same office ever since, till very recently; and who, during the latter part of the time, has been surveyor general himself. I shall introduce a number of witnesses, who, for respectability and intelligence, and a mass of testimony, which, for clearness and conclusiveness, have probably not been equalled in any case before. I shall show, first, that the convention supposed there were rapids in the Des Moines; second, that they called for rapids in the Des Moines; third, that there are rapids in the Des Moines; fourth, the size and magnitude of those rapids; fifth, that the convention did not call for rapids in the Mississippi river; sixth, that they did call for the rapids at the Great Bend in the Des Moines river; and, seventh, that there are no rapids below the Great Bend.

1. The convention believed there were rapids in the river Des Moines. In 1816, four years before the State Government was formed, John C. Sullivan ran the Indian boundary line. This line passed within eight miles of the rapids in the Des Moines, at the Great Bend in said river. John C. Sullivan was there. He was a skilful, practical surveyor, with a practised eye. He was afterwards a member of the convention which formed the constitution of the State. He has now been dead several years. He was a man in whose statements the utmost reliance could be placed. From him and others, the convention derived information.

General Jonathan Ramsay, a member of the convention, says: "I well recollect having a conversation with John C. Sullivan on the subject of the rapids in the Des Moines, not as [to] their being the rapids called for in the act of Congress, (for of this there appeared to be no doubt,) but as to their magnitude, and whether there was any considerable fall at any one place."

The honorable James Evans, then a member of the convention, and since a judge of one of our circuit courts, says: "I distinctly recollect conversing on that subject with General W. Rector and Col. John C. Sullivan. The conclusion was, that the rapids of the river Des Moines meant the rapids in the river, and not those in the Mississippi."

The honorable Hiram H. Baber, then a member of the convention, and for several of the last years auditor of public accounts for our State, says: "I have a distinct recollection that a map was procured from the office of the surveyor general for the use of the convention; but I do not recollect distinctly whether or not 'the rapids in the river Des Moines,' or the 'Des Moines rapids' in the Mississippi river, were marked upon it. From conversations, however, with several members of the convention, I incline to the belief that the rapids in the river Des Moines were designated upon it."

Another witness, General William Milburn, says: "The northern boundary was drawn, according to the general understanding at the time, a few miles north of the Indian boundary."

The honorable John D. Cook, then a member of the convention, and for many years since a judge of one of our circuit courts, says: "In convention, the subject of boundary was referred to a committee, of which I was a member, and all the means accessible to that committee were employed for the purpose of acquiring correct information on that subject. The committee, and I believe the members of the convention, had free access to the office of General Rector, then surveyor general of Illinois and Missouri, which afforded extensive information. They likewise availed themselves of the opportunity of conversing with several gentlemen, then in St. Louis, who had personal knowledge of the existence and locality of several of the objects called for in the proposed boundaries, and especially of the rapids in the river Des Moines. The information thus acquired left no doubt on my mind as to the existence of such rapids."

General William Milburn, then a clerk in the office, but afterwards surveyor general himself, says: "I have to say that, at the time of the sitting of the convention, I was employed as a clerk in the United States surveyor's office for Illinois, Missouri, and Arkansas. That General W. Rector, then surveyor general, was a member of that body, from the county of St. Louis; and that a map was constructed in the surveyor's office, under my superintendence, by direction of the surveyor general, and, as I believe, either at the request of the convention, or of the members, or a portion thereof, in their individual and unofficial capacity. * * * My recollection is distinct relative to the northern boundary of the State, as delineated on the map. * * * The position of the rapids was assumed from the general understanding at the time, and from the particular information of Colonel Sullivan, who was a member of the convention, and was also the surveyor of the Indian boundary line in 1816."

After examining this evidence, no man can hesitate in believing that the convention which formed the constitution of the State of Missouri did believe there were rapids in the river Des Moines.

2. The convention called for rapids in the river Des Moines, and not for rapids in the Mississippi river. The evidence which I shall produce to establish this point seems to me to be irresistible. Let me commence with the testimony of the Hon. John Scott. He says: "I am entirely sure that the rapids spoken of in the bill, and intended by the committee, [in Congress,] were the rapids in the Des Moines river itself, and not the rapids in the Mississippi river, called, from their proximity to the mouth of the Des Moines river, the 'Des Moines rapids.' I am also satisfied that the committee who reported, and the convention who formed and adopted the State constitution, and who assembled on the 12th June, and signed that instrument on the 19th of July, 1821, had reference, in forming the northern line, to the rapids in the Des Moines river, and not those in the Mississippi river, called the 'Des Moines rapids.' * * * I am satisfied that the committee, and Congress, and the convention, all meant and intended the rapids in the river Des Moines itself, which were then known to exist, and were spoken of; and not the rapids in the Mississippi river, called, by way of distinction from the upper rapids, the 'Des Moines rapids.'"

Let it be borne in mind that the Hon. John Scott was our Delegate in Congress when the act was passed, and afterwards a member of the convention which formed the State constitution.

The Hon. B. H. Reeves, (then a member of the convention, and for several years after a member of our State Senate, but at the time of giving this evidence, and still, a citizen of Kentucky) says: "I am unable, thus hastily, to bring my mind to bear upon any particular circumstance connected with the location of the northern boundary, except so far as relates to the rapids of the river Des Moines. Those rapids, then and now, I considered to be the rapids of the river Des Moines. * * * No difficulty ever presented itself to the convention on the subject of those rapids, that I have any recollection of. Indeed, I cannot conceive, at that day, that any existed."

The Hon. H. H. Baber says: "I have always believed that the constitution clearly designated these rapids as the rapids in the river Des Moines, and I never heard this point questioned until within a few years."

The Hon. Jonathan Ramsay says: "So far as my knowledge extends, no other rapids than those in the river Des Moines were ever thought of; certain no other was ever spoken of in the convention, nor out of the convention, within my hearing. I well recollect having a conversation with John C. Sullivan on the subject of the rapids of the Des Moines."

The Hon. James Talbot, another member of the convention, says: "My own distinct impressions were, that it was the rapids in the Des Moines river itself, and not those in any other river that might be of the same name."

The Hon. R. P. Clark, another member of the convention, says: "In relation to the rapids of the Des Moines, I can only say I heard of no other rapids of that name mentioned, but those mentioned in the constitution."

The Hon. James Evans says: "I distinctly recollect conversing on that subject with General W. Rector and Colonel John C. Sullivan. The conversation was started by myself, as to the expression 'through the rapids of the river Des Moines.' The conclusion was, that the rapids of the river Des Moines meant the rapids in the river, and not those in the Mississippi, opposite the mouth of the Des Moines. For the convention to have said the Des Moines rapids, would have left the question vague and uncertain as to the rapids meant; because the Des Moines rapids would as well have meant the rapids in the Mississippi at the mouth, as those in the river [Des Moines;] and to put the question beyond the possibility of a doubt, the expression used in the constitution, 'rapids of the river Des Moines,' was intended for the rapids in the river Des Moines. I have no doubt, from my recollection at this late period, that what I have stated was the idea and intention of the whole convention. I may have conversed with many others, besides those two gentlemen named, on this question; but I am certain that this was mine and their views at the time."

The honorable Edward Bates, who was then a member of the convention, and afterwards a member of Congress from the State of Missouri, says: "In answer to the first point, I have to say, that, while a member of the convention, (nor since,) I never had a doubt that the rapids of the river Des Moines, mentioned in the act of Congress of 1820, and in our constitution, meant the rapids of and in the river Des Moines, and of and in no other river whatever. And it is my confident belief, that every member of the convention entertained the same opinion. At that time there was much conjecture and inquiry about the precise locality of the rapids. The country in that quarter was then a wilderness, and very imperfectly known." This witness says, "the rapids of and in the river Des Moines, and of and in no other river whatever," were called for. No evidence could be more positive or clear.

In reply to a letter of A. M. Lea, commissioner on the part of the United States for ascertaining and marking the boundary between Missouri and Iowa, General William Milburn (who, as before said, was not a member of the convention, but in the office of the surveyor general) says: "In reply to your letter asking me to give you the views entertained and expressed by the members of the convention at the time of the adoption of the constitution of Missouri, and of myself, as to what rapids were meant by 'the rapids of the river Des Moines,' * * I have to inform you that, to the best of my recollection, I never, at the time above named, heard any other rapids spoken of, with reference to our boundary, by any member of the convention, than the rapids in the river Des Moines; which rapids were understood to be at a short distance north of the Indian boundary run by Col. Sullivan in 1816. This understanding was firmly fixed in my mind by the following circumstances: General William Rector, a member of the convention, was, at the time, United States surveyor general for Illinois, Missouri, and Arkansas; and, by his direction, a map of the State, intended particularly to show the boundaries thereof, was constructed in the surveyor's office, under my superintendence, for the use of the convention. On this map, the northern boundary was drawn, in accordance with the general understanding at the time, a few miles north of the Indian boundary. I was with some of the members of the convention every day while they were in session, and often attended their deliberations; and I am certain I did not hear a doubt as to the accuracy of the location of the northern boundary, as delineated on the map. Had there been any different understanding expressed at the time, it would most undoubtedly have come to my knowledge. This recollection of my understanding of the views entertained and expressed by the members of the convention as to the position of our northern boundary, is fully corroborated by the continued and uninterrupted action of the surveyor general's office, with which I have been connected ever since the adoption of the constitution. In none of the operations of said office has the line run by Sullivan been represented as the State boundary; it has uniformly and invariably been treated and considered as an Indian boundary; which would not have been the case, had the convention thought differently; for it cannot be supposed that a matter of this importance would have been overlooked or forgotten. I am, therefore, satisfied and convinced that I cannot possibly be mistaken. It is not with me a vague recollection of a transaction with many intervening and dormant years; but it is a matter which has been constantly before me, in my connexion with the surveyor general's office." It would seem incredible to suppose, after such testimony as this, and from such a man, (and no one stands higher for honor, integrity, and veracity,) that any man could still hesitate to believe that the northern boundary called for "the rapids of the river Des Moines" itself. But this is not all.

The honorable John D. Cook says: "In convention, the subject of boundary was referred to a committee, of which I was a member; and all the means accessible to that committee were employed for the purpose of acquiring correct information on the subject. * * The information thus acquired, left no doubt in my mind of the existence of such rapids; and I have no recollection of any other rapids having been spoken of by any member of the committee or of the convention. * * It was certainly my understanding at the time, and I believe it was that of the members of the convention, that the rapids called for in the northern boundary were rapids in the Des Moines river."

It is clear beyond doubt, then, that the convention did call for rapids in the river Des Moines. With testimony like this, in a court of justice, a jury would not hesitate an instant to decide who was entitled to the territory in dispute, and that decision would be in favor of the claim of Missouri. All we ask is such a decision as a court of justice would give in the case.

Here the CHAIR announced the fact that the gentleman's hour was out.

Mr. EDWARDS said that he was not half through his case. He had not even offered all his evidence. He should appeal to the courtesy of the House for permission to go on. The case was a peculiar one. The House would certainly not undertake to decide, without hearing the whole of it—at least the whole of the evidence.

The CHAIR. The gentleman from Missouri cannot proceed without the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. EDWARDS. Nobody objects; then I can go on. I will now show that there are rapids in the Des Moines river itself.

[Here a member rose and objected to Mr. EDWARDS proceeding. We had rules, and must adhere to them.]

The CHAIR. If objection be made, the gentleman from Missouri can proceed no further.

Mr. EDWARDS asked if it would be in order to offer an amendment to the bill?

The CHAIR answered it would.

Mr. EDWARDS then offered the following amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert "That the parallel of latitude which passes through the rapids of the Des Moines, at the Great Bend in the said river, shall be the northern boundary of the State of Missouri, from the point where it intersects the middle of the main channel of the Missouri river to the point where it intersects the middle of the main channel of the Des Moines river; and the said northern boundary line shall run from thence, with the main channel of the said river Des Moines, to the Mississippi river, as provided in the constitution of Missouri."

Mr. EDWARDS. I claim the floor on this amendment, and will now proceed with my case.

The CHAIR. The bill and amendment are, in substance, the same; and the gentleman from Missouri cannot proceed.

Mr. EDWARDS said they were not the same; that they were totally different. The bill proposed to make the Indian boundary, run by John C. Sullivan in 1816, the State boundary; the amendment proposed to make the parallel of latitude which runs through the rapids of the river Des Moines, at the Great Bend, the boundary. They were totally different.

The CHAIR looked upon them as the same thing, and the gentleman from Missouri could not proceed.

Mr. EDWARDS. I think the Chair is wrong; and that belief, and the importance of presenting my case entire, force me to appeal from the decision.

The question was put, and the committee sustained the Chair, and Mr. EDWARDS took his seat.

Mr. A. C. DODGE replied to the arguments of the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. MCKAY had an amendment which he wished to submit, and to which he wished to call the attention of the Delegate from Iowa. His vote would depend on whether the House would adopt it. He would observe that, so far as Iowa was concerned in this controversy, it was in the power of the House to fix the boundary line; but, with regard to Missouri, the case was otherwise—it was not in the power of Congress to deprive her of any of her territorial rights. The boundaries of Missouri were fixed by law when she was a Territory; and what these boundaries were, was a judicial question for the United States courts to decide. The proviso he wished to offer was, that this boundary line should not be deemed conclusive till the Legislature of Missouri declared the assent of the State to it.

Mr. EDWARDS explained. The boundaries of Missouri are fixed by her constitution. They cannot be changed by a simple act of the Legislature. It must be by a change of the constitution. To make this change will require a vote of two-thirds of each branch of the Legislature, at two successive sessions, and then the assent of Congress.

After some further remarks from Mr. MCKAY, Mr. G. DAVIS addressed the committee at length in support of the claims of the Territory of Iowa.

Mr. EDWARDS again obtained the floor.

Mr. Chairman: When my hour expired, I had just finished showing that the convention did call for rapids in the Des Moines river. I shall now proceed to the next point.

3. There are rapids in the river Des Moines. This is the next point to be established; and this I shall establish without reference to the testimony of any one member of the convention. My first witness is Doctor James Davis, commissioner on the part of Iowa herself to ascertain the boundary in dispute. To his testimony Iowa will hardly object, even if the United States should. He says: "I admit there are rapids in the Des Moines river." Here is the very thing itself—dressed in the plainest language—neither a word too much, nor a word too little. This evidence is conclusive against Iowa; but, as she has only a remote interest in the territory in dispute, the House may not consider it conclusive against the United States, one of the real parties in this case. I will therefore introduce the evidence of other witnesses. Doctor James Davis speaks of several rapids, and notices them by name; but I have not time to refer to everything at once. The point is, "there are rapids in the Des Moines river," and the commissioner for Iowa admits the truth of it.

In 1838, A. M. Lea was appointed by the United States to run the boundary in dispute. His evidence will not be questioned even by the United States. He is your own witness. Lieutenant Lea says: "In ascending the Des Moines river from its mouth, several shallow places, with swift currents, are found below the 'Great Bend;' but there is no obstruction of magnitude sufficient to deserve the appellation of 'rapids' below those at the place just named," the Great Bend. There is at the Great Bend, "at low water, a fall of one or two feet in a distance of about eighty yards; and, in a part of the width of the stream, the water falls perpendicularly about ten or twelve inches." Here are two important facts stated by your own witness: 1st. There is nothing which deserves "the appellation of 'rapids' below those at the Great Bend." 2d. There are "obstructions of magnitude sufficient to deserve the appellation of 'rapids' at the Great Bend." Lieutenant Lea says, also, "there are other rapids above the Great Bend." This we admit. [See House Doc. 128, 3d sess. 25th Congress.] Lieutenant Lea says: "the water falls perpendicularly about ten or twelve inches." Then the fall is hardly less than "two feet in a distance of about eighty yards," the length of the rapids. There was no dam here when Lieutenant Lea examined the rapids, and he saw them in their full extent.

Captain Guion surveyed the Des Moines in 1841, under instructions from the Topographical Bureau. He is another of your own officers and own witnesses, and from whose report your committee has drawn bountifully. He surveyed simply for the purpose of ascertaining the obstructions to navigation, and not with reference to any particular rapids. He says the obstructions in the Des Moines "consist of slight rapids, termed by the boatmen 'ripples.'" He marked twelve rapids. He says: "I was met by a considerable flood of water in ascending;" and he does not give the fall in any of the rapids, and probably for this reason. But he states the important fact, that there are rapids in the river Des Moines itself.

Lieutenant J. C. Fremont, another of your own officers and witnesses, and one from whom your committee has drawn information also, made a survey of the Des Moines in 1841. He says: "The bed of the river is sand and gravel, and sometimes rock, of which the rapids generally consist. * * The most considerable rapid above the Great Bend is at the head of the island above Keokuc's village." He speaks, also, of other rapids. It is useless to refer to the evidence of officers appointed on the part of the State of Missouri to ascertain the true location of the Northern boundary. This evidence is sufficient to establish the point that there are rapids in the Des Moines itself, without more, unless those who are to decide the case are determined on not believing anything.

In the first report of the Committee on Territories, made in 1840, "the committee admits that the name of the rapids, called for in the boundary of that State, would indicate their situation to be in the river Des Moines;" and they admit that "the two first rapids in that river have each but a fall of about two feet in about eighty yards."—[House Document No. 2, 1st session 26th Congress.] This is an admission on the part of your committee, that there are rapids in the river Des Moines itself; and yet, strange as it may appear, in the next report, made in 1842, your committee says, in so many words, "there are no rapids in the Des Moines."—House Doc. No. 791, page 6, 2d session 27th Congress.

In the main, the committee may have been differently organized; yet both reports are drawn up by the same member, and without any additional testimony on this point, except that of Captain Guion and Lieutenant Fremont, both of whom say there are rapids in the Des Moines. I allude to this because it indicates a disposition to waive the facts, instead of meeting them openly, and deciding the case according to the law and the facts. You have the power to save us the necessity of resorting to the courts. If we are right, you ought to do so. There is no wisdom in perplexing us, when you have nothing to gain by it. We wish to avoid any ill-feeling between ourselves and our near neighbor, the Territory of Iowa. You should aid us in doing so.

I have now shown that the convention believed there were rapids in the Des Moines; that they called for rapids in the Des Moines; and that there are rapids in the Des Moines. The next inquiry would naturally be, what rapids in the river Des Moines did the convention call for? But as the committee have discredited their own officers and their own witnesses, and have decided that "there are no rapids in the river Des Moines," and that "they are ripples merely," and as the House may be disposed to adopt the opinions of the committee now advanced against their former admissions, I shall next attempt to show the magnitude of these rapids, and that one of them, at least, is entitled to that appellation.

4. Then let us inquire what are rapids; and let us look at the size and magnitude of these rapids in the river Des Moines. Rapids are that part of a river where the current runs with more celerity than the common current; and they imply a considerable descent of the earth, but not sufficient to cause a fall of the water, or what is called a cascade, or cataract. This is Webster's definition; and it is certainly a very good one. Rapids, then, are something less than a cataract, a cascade, or a fall; and something greater than a shallow, a shoal, or a ripple. Lieutenant Lea says, in speaking of the Great Bend, "there is, at low water, a fall of one or two feet in a distance of about eighty yards; and in part of the width of the stream, the water falls perpendicularly about ten or twelve inches." At this point the river is about six hundred feet wide. This perpendicular fall of twelve inches, as I am informed, runs from three to four hundred feet across the river. This perpendicular fall is at the foot of the rapids. The rapids are about eighty yards long; and the other twelve inches of the fall in the water are in the eighty yards above the perpendicular fall. In the report made in 1840, the Committee on Territories said: "The first two rapids in that river have each but a fall of two feet in about eighty yards." This admission was made by taking the evidence as they found it. Captain Guion says he was met by a flood when he surveyed the river; and he does not give the fall of any of the rapids.

Lieutenant Fremont speaks of the falls at the Great Bend as well as others. He says: "The rapid of the Great Bend * * * has a fall of twelve inches; and, so far as I could ascertain, had formerly a depth of eighteen inches at low water. A dam has been built at this place." The fall of "twelve inches" here spoken of is the perpendicular fall. "A dam has been built at this place." This dam is near this fall, and backs the water over the fall in the eighty yards above, and thus prevented Lieutenant Fremont from seeing any but the perpendicular fall.

Lieutenant Lea saw the rapids before the dam was built. At low-water mark there is an abrupt fall in part of the width of the stream of "about ten or twelve inches." This seems to be sufficient to constitute a "rapids;" it borders closely on a "falls." A declension of two feet in eighty yards, with a perpendicular fall at the foot of them of "ten or twelve inches," through the whole width of the stream, would evidently have entitled the place to the appellation of "falls;" but, as the perpendicular fall was only "in part of the width of the stream," and that, of course, irregular and broken, it is probable that few points could have deserved better the appellation of a "rapids," as distinguishing it from a "fall," or "cascade," or "cataract," either of which might have been higher on the one hand; or from a "shallow," which might have either a rock or gravel bottom, with little current; or from a "ripple," with scarcely any fall, and not much current; or from a "shoal," which always has a "gravel bottom."

But, as to the amount of declension here, it is sufficiently great, whether it be one or two feet in eighty yards.

The fall of the "Des Moines rapids" in the Mississippi river is but twenty-four feet in fourteen miles. This is a fall of less than one inch—barely over three quarters—in every eighty yards. The fall at the rapids of the Great Bend in the Des Moines is from twelve to twenty-four inches in eighty yards. If a fall of less than one inch in eighty yards will make a "rapids" in one river, a fall of twelve inches in eighty yards, in another river, would constitute a pretty fair claim to the appellation of "rapids" also; and a declension of two feet in eighty yards would give the claim beyond all dispute. A declension of twelve inches in eighty yards would give, in fourteen miles, a fall of three hundred feet and upwards; and a fall of two feet in eighty yards would give, in fourteen miles, a fall of six hundred feet and upwards; while the rapids in the Mississippi fall, in fourteen miles, but twenty-four feet. Your committee admit that there are other rapids in the Des Moines still larger than these, but higher up. (See report 1842, page 4.) They admit and deny everything; they admit there are rapids, and they deny that there are rapids. But these rapids are of sufficient magnitude to deserve the appellation of rapids; and this is what I wanted to prove here.

But suppose, as the committee assert, that "there are no rapids in the Des Moines river:" what shall be done? It is clear that the convention thought there were rapids in the Des Moines river. It is equally clear that the convention called for rapids in the Des Moines river. As this is so, you cannot drive us out of the Des Moines river, and into the Mississippi river. Our bearing point must still remain where it was fixed originally—in the Des Moines river itself. If there be no rapids there of great magnitude, we must then take that fall or declension of the water in said river, which bears the nearest approach to a rapids. This is what must be done. Nothing else can be done.

5. The convention did not call for rapids in the Mississippi river. The members of the convention are clear on this point. I will make the extracts from the evidence as short as possible. Ramsey says: "I will only add, that neither in nor out of the convention, during its session, did I ever hear the rapids in the Mississippi mentioned as in any way connected with the northern boundary of this State." Bates says: "I am satisfied that, for ten years after the formation of the constitution, I never heard it suggested that the rapids of the Mississippi river had any relation whatever to the designation of our northern boundary. I believe it was an afterthought." Cook says: "I have no recollection of any other rapids having been spoken of by any member of the committee or of the convention; and, indeed, I had no knowledge or information of the existence of the rapids in the Mississippi, called the Des Moines rapids, until after the dispute respecting the northern boundary of this State had arisen." Scott says: "I am satisfied that the committee, and Congress, and the convention, all meant and intended the rapids in the river Des Moines itself, which were then known to exist, and were spoken of, and not the rapids in the Mississippi river. Clearer, more positive, more unequivocal, more pertinent testimony, never was given in any case, to establish any point. The convention, then, did not call for rapids in the Mississippi river.

But, aside from the evidence, the language used in the constitution is itself clear, and distinct, and unequivocal, so far as any ambiguity, in reference to the river in which the rapids are to be found, exists. I admit that, since it has been ascertained that there are more rapids in the river Des Moines than one, there is an ambiguity as to the rapids in that river which the convention called for. But that there is any doubt, from the character of the language used, whether they called for rapids in the river Des Moines or in the Mississippi river, I utterly deny. The phrase which is attempted to be made ambiguous is, "the rapids of the river Des Moines;" but there is no ambiguity in it in reference to the river called for. This phrase means "the rapids in the river Des Moines." The "falls of the Ohio." There is no ambiguity here. This means "the falls in the Ohio." "The falls of the Niagara." There is no ambiguity here. This means "the falls in the Niagara." "The falls of the St. Anthony." There is no ambiguity here. This means "the falls in the St. Anthony." "The rapids of the Mississippi." There is no ambiguity here. This means "the rapids in the Mississippi. "The rapids of the river Des Moines." Why fasten an ambiguity here? This means "the rapids in the Des Moines;" and man had to tax his keenest ingenuity, in perverting language from its proper use, before he could torture this expression, to make it mean rapids in the Mississippi river. If the convention had called for the "Des Moines rapids," then an ambiguity, as to the river in which these rapids were to be found, might have existed. "Des Moines rapids" would naturally mean "rapids of the river Des Moines;" and we know that "Des Moines rapids," by custom, now means, and has for a long time meant, certain rapids in the Mississippi river. An ambiguity might then have existed, if the phrase "Des Moines rapids" had been used; but that the phrase "the rapids of the river Des Moines" should be considered ambiguous, as to the river in which the rapids were to be found, is, indeed, strange enough.

6. The convention did call for the rapids at the Great Bend in the Des Moines river. The evidence in support of this point is less clear and less abundant than in support of some of the other points. There are several rapids above those at the Great Bend, and some of them are said to be even larger than those at the Great Bend. General Milburn says: "My recollection is distinct relative to the northern boundary of the State, as delineated on the map. It was represented at some short distance north of the Indian boundary run by John C. Sullivan in 1816, and as striking the rapids in the river Des Moines." Sullivan had run the Indian boundary line four years before the State constitution was formed, and had visited the rapids at the Great Bend, and had examined them, and was able to give correct information in regard to them. Our committee are inconsistent and contradictory in their report. In one place they say, "there are no rapids in the Des Moines." In another page they tell us that the rapids at the Great Bend "are not the first, by three, in ascending the river." Not the first by three! This is not only giving us rapids in the river Des Moines; but it is giving us one more than anybody else has ever pretended to find, and three more than anybody, whose business it was really to look for rapids, has ever found below the Great Bend. Captain Guion surveyed the river to find the obstructions to navigation. He mixes them all together, and says there are six rapids or "ripples" "in the first hundred miles in ascending from the mouth:" "one at Keosauque," [the Great Bend;] another "about ten miles lower down;" "three in forty miles above the mill-dam at Keosauque," [the Great Bend;] and "one in forty miles, [of the mouth,] having a gravel bottom." This makes three above the Great Bend; one at the Great Bend, is the fourth; one ten miles below, is the fifth; and one in forty miles of the mouth, is the sixth: making the six in the first one hundred miles; and, if I am capable of counting, only two below the Great Bend, and the lowest of these has a gravel bottom. Let it be remembered that this officer and witness says they are "slight rapids, termed by the boatmen ripples;" and that he says, "I was met in my ascent by a considerable flood;" and then the appearance of the rapids to him will be easily accounted for. In high water they looked like ripples merely, and they all looked alike. Lieutenant Fremont says, "Another dam has been built at a rapid twelve miles lower down, [than the Great Bend,] where the river was six hundred and fifty feet wide. The fall * * * * was represented to me as slight." This is the rapid which Captain Guion fixes ten miles below the Great Bend. "Four and a half miles lower down, another dam is in the course of construction, but the rapid here is inconsiderable." This is the last noticed by Lieutenant Fremont, and is the same noticed by Captain Guion, within forty miles of the mouth. They differ slightly in distances; but Lieutenant Fremont seems to have been more particular than Captain Guion.

The lowest he fixes four miles and a half below the next above, and the next only twelve miles below the Great Bend. Guion says ten. This first one has a "gravel bottom," and an "inconsiderable" current. The committee say, "there are no rapids in the river Des Moines." Of course, then, they would not count this "gravel bottom," with "inconsiderable" current, as one. The next is six hundred and fifty feet wide—a little above the usual width of the river—the current "slight," and of course owing to the great width and want of fall. And this the committee would not consider a rapids either. The first rapids, then i a the Great Bend.

But Lieutenant Lea examined the river especially in reference to the boundary question and the existence of rapids. He is your own officer and your own witness, and you must not discredit him. He says: "Several shallow places, with swift currents, are found below the Great Bend; but there is no obstruction of magnitude sufficient to deserve * * * the appellation of 'rapids,' below those at the place thus named, where there is, at low water, a fall of one or two feet in about eighty yards." This settles the question that the first rapids are at the Great Bend. Commissioners, appointed on the part of the State of Missouri to examine the river, report the rapids at the Great Bend as "the first rapids in the river Des Moines above the mouth." Lieutenant Lea further says, the line "passing through the Des Moines river at the Great Bend is understood to be the line claimed by the State of Missouri; and if any rapids in the Des Moines river ought to be regarded as the governing point, I believe that these should be taken, as being the best known on account of their proximity to the mouth and to the old boundary. * * * Should Congress be of opinion that the fourth line, or the line passing through the rapids in the Des Moines river, is the true boundary, I would respectfully recommend the definitive adoption of the line already run through that point by the authority of the State of Missouri. It was carefully surveyed and marked by Joseph C. Brown, of St. Louis, a gentleman in every way qualified to perform the duty." There are, then, no rapids below those at the Great Bend, according to the report of your own commissioner. In claiming the rapids at the Great Bend, then, we claim the least we are entitled to—we claim the lowest rapids in the river. If you insist on forcing us higher up, we cannot help that. That will be your fault, and not ours. We show our moderation by demanding as little as we can—the lowest rapids.

The next argument to prove that the rapids in the Great Bend are the rapids called for in fixing our northern boundary, has, singularly enough, been perverted by the committee into an argument to prove that we had never called for rapids in the river Des Moines. In the report made in 1840, your committee says, "the next task is to identify the rapids of the river Des Moines," referred to in the boundary of Missouri. The mind is struck by the fact that these rapids are not placed in the northern boundary line, but are introduced for the purpose of fixing a parallel of latitude, upon which the western line should terminate; and when this parallel is thus located, the northern line is required to pursue it east, "to the middle of the channel of the main fork of the river Des Moines. * * * * It cannot be readily conceived that a rapids of such note and importance as to define a parallel of latitude, upon which one line of a great State was made to terminate, and along which another line was made to run and corner upon them, should yet not be called for in the description of the line. An object so well calculated to give the desired permanent notoriety to the boundary lines of a member of this confederacy, would doubtless have been introduced in setting them forth in the charter of its existence." [House Doc. No. 2, 1st sess. 26th Congress, pages 4 and 5.] Now, nothing is more easily explained than all this; and it seems to me that nothing is more natural than the manner of describing the northern boundary adopted by the convention; and that manner of describing shows, beyond a doubt, that new, and unexplored, and uninhabited as the country was, yet the convention had information enough about it to know what they were doing, and also that they did call for rapids at the Great Bend, and not for rapids higher up the Des Moines river. It shows, also, how the truth will unfold itself, and how plain it may be made. Here I must ask a reference to the chart of the Des Moines river, and of the northern boundary, as made out by Lieutenant Lea, and attached to his report. It will be seen by this chart, that there is a great bend in the Des Moines river at this point, and that the rapids are on the east side of this great bend, and that the river runs some miles south of the rapids, and before it reaches the rapids. The rapids are not called for in the description of the northern boundary. The northern boundary runs east, "along the parallel of latitude which passes through the rapids of the river Des Moines." These rapids are on the east side of the bend. The north boundary, in following the parallel of latitude from west to east, encounters "the middle of the channel of the main fork of the Des Moines" several miles before it reaches the "rapids" themselves. To have pursued the parallel of latitude until it passed through the "rapids," would have taken the line across the Des Moines river, and would have included, in the State of Missouri, several hundred, and perhaps several thousand acres of land, lying on the north side of the Des Moines river. This the convention wanted to avoid; they wanted the Des Moines river to be the boundary line. To make it so, when the north boundary reached the main channel of the main fork of that river, they changed the direction of the boundary, and ran down the middle of the main channel of the main fork of that river to the mouth. If the line had followed a parallel of latitude running through any other rapids in this river, the rapids should have been called for in closing the boundary; because a parallel of latitude passing through any other rapids in this river, would have struck the river, for the first time, at the rapids themselves. It is not so at the Great Bend; and these are the only rapids in the Des Moines river where it is not so. This peculiar manner of describing the northern boundary clearly fixes the rapids in the Great Bend as the rapids called for in describing that boundary, and annihilates the argument of the committee that these rapids had not been called for, and that they were, therefore, in the Mississippi river.

It may not be in order to say that this error in the report of 1840 was pointed out to the present Committee on the Territories, and the matter explained to them. At all events, they abandon the argument in the first report, but still maintain the same position, but by a different argument, in the report of this session. Your committee now says that, "as the line on the northern border of Missouri, upon the hypothesis assumed by her, would intersect the rapids named in her boundary, the almost irresistible presumption is, that those rapids would have been referred to in the description of this line. It would be strange indeed, if, beforehand, Congress should recognise these rapids as of such prominent consequence as to define upon them a parallel of latitude which should arrest the course of the western line, and should then conduct the northern line along this parallel to the Des Moines river, and then along the middle of the main channel thereof, passing through these same rapids, and yet should wholly omit to mention them in the description of this line. Nor is this position weakened by the fact that the northern line would strike the river in the bend above the rapids. * * * * It would be difficult, indeed, to believe that, impressed, as Congress must have been, with the important character of these rapids, it yet should establish this line so as to cut them in the centre, and yet make no mention of them as in any way connected with it. How easy and natural it would have been, after having proceeded with the boundary to the river Des Moines, to have added, "thence down said river, in the middle of the main channel thereof, and through the centre of the rapids aforesaid, to the mouth of the said river, where it empties into the Mississippi." I admit this would have been "easy," but not more "easy" than idle, and silly, and foolish; because the line was not apt to be lost as long as it was to follow the middle of the main channel of a river six hundred feet wide. But the convention did not do everything which was "easy" to be done. Let me give an example: "The rapids of the river Des Moines." The committee says this means the rapids of the Mississippi river. If the convention so meant, how "easy" it would have been to have said "the rapids of the river Des Moines" in the river Mississippi. Another example: If the convention had wanted rapids in the Mississippi river, and had only called for the "Des Moines rapids" in the Mississippi river, this would have fixed the rapids in that river beyond all question; and this would have been "easy;" but they did not do so. Then, if the convention called for rapids in the Mississippi river, they did not do things in the easiest manner; but, in this case, adopted the most difficult of all modes, except one, of accomplishing their object. If the convention had called for "the rapids in the river Des Moines," and not for "the rapids of the river Des Moines," then I believe it would have been a little more difficult to have driven us from home, and into the Mississippi river, than it is now; but not much more so. Then, our convention did not do everything which was "easy."

But I am disposed to treat this argument seriously, although the committee have shifted from the grounds assumed in their first report. Beaten from their position, they should have surrendered. The pride which makes us adhere to an opinion when convinced that that opinion is unfounded, is a erroneous pride. In such cases it is more manly to acknowledge our error than to assume another false position. But the committee has waived the former, and chosen the latter course.

The committee now says, that although the northern boundary comes in contact with the Des Moines river several miles before it reaches the rapids at the Great Bend, and then takes a new direction "down the middle of the main channel of said river," yet, in passing the rapids below, the boundary should take a passing notice of these rapids. "The prominent objects through which a boundary passes should be named." If this be true with reference to the northern boundary, it is also true, and equally so, with reference to the western boundary. Let us then see whether the prominent objects in the western boundary were called for in describing that boundary.

The southern boundary runs west, along the parallel of latitude thirty-six degrees thirty minutes, "to a point where the said parallel of latitude is intersected by a meridian line passing through the middle of the mouth of the Kansas river, where the same empties into the Missouri river." Here is a prominent object near the centre of the western line—"the mouth of the Kansas river"—and this, according to the committee, must be called for in describing that line. But this is a description of the southern line. It runs to said meridian line—that passing through the mouth of the Kansas river—and then stops. Then commences the description of the western boundary. This starts at the termination of the southern boundary, and is in these words: "Thence, from the point aforesaid, north, along the said meridian line, to the intersection of the parallel of latitude which passes through the rapids of the river Des Moines, making the said line correspond with the Indian boundary line." This is the description of the western boundary, and yet the prominent object—the object which fixes the meridian on which it runs—"the mouth of the Kansas river"—is not once mentioned in describing this boundary. If a failure to call for the "rapids" in the northern boundary unsettles the northern boundary, then, by the same rule, a failure to call for the "mouth of the Kansas," in the western boundary, unsettles the western boundary. But the western boundary is not affected by this failure to call for the "mouth of the Kansas." No more, then, is the northern boundary affected by a failure to call for the "rapids." The "mouth of the Kansas" is not once mentioned in describing the western boundary.

Nor are "the rapids of the river Des Moines" once mentioned in describing the northern boundary. They are introduced as descriptive of the western boundary. They fix the parallel of latitude on which the western boundary is to terminate. The southern boundary ends at the meridian, passing through the mouth of the Kansas. The western boundary commences here, and runs "thence, from the point aforesaid," to "the parallel of latitude which passes through the rapids of the river Des Moines." This parallel of latitude the western boundary intersects, and here terminates; and here starts the northern boundary; and this runs "thence east, from the point of intersection last aforesaid, along the said parallel of latitude, to the middle of the channel of the main fork of the said river Des Moines; thence, down and along the middle of the main channel of the said river Des Moines, to the mouth of the same." This is the description of the northern boundary. The "rapids" are not once mentioned in it, any more than was the "mouth of the Kansas" mentioned in describing the western boundary. It was wholly useless to do so. When you fix the termination of the western boundary, then you have the beginning of the northern boundary. The termination of the western boundary is the "parallel of latitude which passes through the rapids of the river Des Moines." At this termination the northern boundary begins. Along this parallel of latitude the northern boundary runs. No point need be called for along this parallel of latitude till you cease to follow it. In following it, the first object you strike, which changes your direction, should be mentioned. This done. We strike the Des Moines river several iles before we reach the "rapids"—we run to the iddle of the channel of the main fork—we call r this point—we then change our direction, and llow the middle of the main channel of the river es Moines, and we pass through the rapids at the reat Bend in the Des Moines, and do not notice em any more than we did the "mouth of the ansas" in running the western boundary through at; nor was it necessary to do so. But the committee insists that it is not sufficiently certain to say e are going down the middle of the main channel the river Des Moines. We must say "we are ssing through the rapids at the Great Bend." his was surely unnecessary, if not worse than eless.

I admit that, if the "mouth of the Kansas" had en the terminating point of the western boundary, en the mouth of that river should have been call- l for in the description of the western boundary. So, the northern boundary had run along the parallel of titude up to "the rapids of the river Des Moines," id had there changed its direction, then the "rap- is" should have been called for, also. In this case, e description should have been in these words: ence east from the point of intersection aforesaid, long the said parallel of latitude, to "the middle of e rapids of the river Des Moines;" and thence own the middle of the main channel of the main rk of said river, calling for none of the "ripples" "rapids" below. As the rapids are not called for the closing of the northern boundary on the Des loines river, it seems conclusive that the rapids at e Great Bend are the rapids called for by the con- ention. The line would have struck the rapids at ny other point as soon as it reached the river; but ot so at this point: and this is the only point where is not so.

But the rapids at the Great Bend are, no doubt, e rapids called for by the constitution. But, under e usual rule of construction, if we had no evi- ence, we might be entitled to rapids much higher p the Des Moines than those at the Great Bend. When a line calls for a long or a large object as a earing point, without designating the particular bject called for, the line must be fixed in the cen- e of the object. When a line calls for several ob- cts as a bearing point, the medium point between em is the true position for the line. When a line alls for one of several objects, without designating e particular object, the true position is on that ob- ct nearest the centre of the several called for. Un- er this rule, if our evidence does not show that we re entitled to the rapids at the Great Bend, then we re entitled to rapids still higher up.

7. There are no rapids below the Great Bend. I ave, in part, shown this in the preceding part of ny argument. There is a ripple ten miles below, ccording to Captain Guion, and twelve, according o Lieutenant Fremont. The fall is "slight;" but either of them fixes it at anything—not so much as ive inches. There is a shoal with a "gravel bot- om," with an "inconsiderable" current, four miles nd a half lower down, according to Lieutenant remont, and "forty miles above the mouth," ac- ording to Captain Guion. Of course this is no rapids"—having a gravel bottom, and but little cur- ent. There are no others below the Great Bend. Lieutenant Lea says "there is no obstruction of nagnitude sufficient to deserve the * appellation f 'rapids' below those at the Great Bend." (See is report, Doc. No. 128, 3d sess. 25th Cong., p. 6.) These are all your own witnesses, and you should ot discredit them. The evidence of Lieutenant ea, especially, is entitled to weight. He surveyed vith reference to this very question. The other entlemen did not. He was looking for rap- ds. They were looking for obstructions to avigation. You should credit Lieutenant Lea, hen, when he tells you there are no obstruc- ions which deserve the name of rapids below the Great Bend. The commissioners appointed by the State of Missouri to examine the Des Moines riv- r, report, also, that there are no rapids below the Great Bend. The truth is, the two points below he Great Bend, which the committee sometimes lignify with the appellation of rapids, have really a fall of but five or six inches in fifty or one hun- dred yards; and of course are not rapids, and hardly 'ripples."

I have now shown: 1st. That the act of Congress of March 6, 1820, does not give boundaries to the State of Missouri; 2d. That the constitution of the State, sanctioned by the act of Congress of 2d March, 1821, admitting Missouri into the Union, does give boundaries to the State; 3d. That the convention which adopted the State constitution believed there were rapids in the Des Moines river; 4th. That they called for rapids in the Des Moines river; 5th. That there are rapids in the Des Moines river; 6th. That the rapids at the Great Bend are of considerable size and magnitude, and distinctly marked, and the first in ascending the river; 7th. That the convention did not call for rapids in the Mississippi river; and 8th. That they did call for rapids at the Great Bend, in the Des Moines river.

If the first act of Congress were the controlling instrument, and gave the boundaries to the State, and not the constitution of the State, sanctioned by the second act of Congress, still our evidence would show us entitled to the boundary we claim, even under the act of Congress. The evidence to explain the ambiguity in the act of Congress, as well as that in the constitution of the State, shows that the rapids called for were in the river Des Moines itself, and not in the Mississippi river.

In reference to the ambiguity in the act of Congress, I think I hazard but little in saying that there is but one man now living who can testify with any certainty. That man is the honorable John Scott, who was the delegate from the Territory of Missouri, and who was chairman of the committee; and who drew up the act of Congress in which this ambiguity is found. The ambiguous words are, "the rapids of the river Des Moines." Were they rapids in the Des Moines river, or were they rapids in the Mississippi river?

The honorable John Scott says:

"At the time the act of 6th of March, 1820, was passed by Congress, authorizing the people of Missouri to form a constitution and State Government, the general geography was but little, and the topography of that part of the State still less known. I (who represented the country) knew so little, that I had to rely on the information of others in regard to the lines. I applied to several for information. * * * * They all concurred that there were rapids in the Des Moines river itself, some sixty miles from the mouth. * * * * I am entirely sure that the rapids spoken of in the bill, and intended by the committee, were the rapids in the Des Moines river itself, and not the rapids in the Mississippi river, called, from their proximity to the mouth of the Des Moines river, the 'Des Moines rapids.'"

This evidence is clear, unequivocal, and to the point. It explains the ambiguity in the act of Congress, and fixes the meaning of that act beyond the possibility of a doubt. It settles the point that, by the expression "the rapids of the river Des Moines," Congress meant the rapids in the river Des Moines itself, and not rapids in the Mississippi river. I defy the introduction of any other witness to prove the reverse of this. It cannot be done, because this is true. The credibility, the respectability, and the entire veracity of our witness, is unquestionable. He speaks to the point, positively, unequivocally, and conclusively. Then, with him who believes the act of Congress gives boundaries to our State, this settles the matter.

This would seem to close my case in reference to the northern boundary; and I would leave that boundary here, if some arguments of the committee did not seem to require an answer.

The committee finds an ambiguity in the use of the word "of." "The rapids 'of' the river Des Moines." This phrase does not mean the rapids "in" the river Des Moines, according to the committee, but means the "Des Moines rapids," in the Mississippi river. In the general, too, it would mean the rapids "in" the Des Moines river; but in this particular case it does not. Yet, in their report of 1840, "the committee admit that the name of the rapids, called for in the boundary of that State, would indicate their situation to be 'in' the river Des Moines."—See p. 6 of that report.

In the report of this session, the committee says, "it is not 'a rapids in,' but 'the rapids of the river Des Moines,' which was thought worthy to be associated with those other conspicuous and everlasting monuments of divisional State lines." The "Des Moines rapids, in the Mississippi river, were called for;" then it follows that the "rapids of the river Des Moines" are rapids in the Mississippi river. "What a conspicuous and everlasting monument" of sophistry and perversion of language! "The Falls of the Ohio," the "Falls of the Potomac," "the Falls of the St. Peter's," "the Falls of the Niagara," do not mean falls "in" those several rivers, as the committee would construe the language. "The rapids of the Mississippi river" do not mean rapids in that river. "Thence, down along the middle 'of' the main channel 'of' the the said river Des Moines, to the mouth of the same," does not mean "in" the Des Moines river, according to our committee. To express this meaning, the language should be: "thence, down along the middle, 'in' the main channel, 'in' the Des Moines, to the mouth." This would have been clear, but the phrase is very ambiguous as the word "of" was used; and, perhaps, the committee would rather incline to the belief that "the middle 'of' the main channel 'of' the Des Moines," was in the middle in the main channel in the Mississippi river; but such perversion of language is unbecoming grave legislators. They should look at things as they are, and meet the truth as it comes, and pervert nothing. There is an ambiguity as to what "rapids of the river Des Moines" were meant. The convention did not know at the time that there was more than one rapids in the Des Moines; but there is no ambiguity as to the river in which these rapids are to be found.

If the convention had used the expression "Des Moines rapids," then there would have been an ambiguity as to the river in which we were to look for these rapids. The phrase "Des Moines rapids," would readily indicate rapids in the river Des Moines; and a stranger, knowing nothing of the rapids, would look in that river to find them. But the history of the country shows us that there are rapids in the Mississippi river, called the "Des Moines rapids;" because they are near the mouth of Des Moines river, and to distinguish them from the "Rock river rapids" in the Mississippi, near the mouth of Rock river.

In this state of the case, a stranger might well have hesitated whether to look for the rapids in the Des Moines river or in the Mississippi river. He would reason in this way: the "Des Moines rapids" should be in the Des Moines river; but there are "Des Moines rapids" in the Mississippi also; and yet if the convention had called for the latter, to make the description certain, they should have said the "Des Moines rapids" in the Mississippi river. This would have been adding but four words, and would have fixed the boundary beyond all doubt on the rapids of the Mississippi. But to have used the phrase "Des Moines rapids," and to have omitted the words "in the Mississippi river," would have left the constitution ambiguous as to the river called for, and have left the north boundary floating between "the rapids of the river Des Moines," and "the rapids of the Mississippi river." And in that case, the State of Missouri might well have contended that the rapids were in the Des Moines river. Then to say that the expression "the rapids of the river Des Moines" means rapids in the Mississippi river, is "preposterous and absurd."

In the report of 1840, the committee says: "A boundary line, as stable and enduring as the Des Moines rapids of the Mississippi, and as certain as the operations of science, was prescribed." See page 7. In 1842, the committee says: "It was the 'Des Moines rapids,' in the great 'father of waters,' that Congress adopted and set forth as one of the most prominent monuments in all the boundary of Missouri." See page 11. Here the committee labors under the mistake of supposing the first act of Congress controlled the boundary, and not the constitution of the State, sanctioned by the second act of Congress, admitting the State into the Union. They overlook also the testimony of John Scott, which is clear and conclusive on this point, and would be so decided in any court of justice in the Union, or the world. He was our Delegate. He drew up the first act of Congress. He says he "applied to several for information;" that "they all concurred that there were rapids in the river Des Moines itself;" that "the rapids spoken of in the bill, and intended by the committee, were the rapids in the Des Moines river itself;" and that they did not refer to "the rapids in the Mississippi river, called, from their proximity to the mouth of the Des Moines river, the Des Moines rapids." Here is the naked truth in reference to the history of the act of Congress; and I defy any man to bring a particle of evidence to the contrary. Then, what a perversion of truth to say that "it was the 'Des Moines rapids,' in the great 'father of floods,' which Congress adopted and set forth as one of the most prominent monuments in all the boundaries of Missouri!"

Let it be noticed here, distinctly, that the committee is making the description of the boundaries emanate with Congress; and this gives the language of the description an English origin. And let it be remembered, that when the committee wish to Frenchify the description of the boundaries, they then refer to the constitution of the State, which had its origin in the city of St. Louis, where the population was mostly French; and they give that a French origin. In this way, they have ingeniously worked themselves into the belief, that the expression "the rapids of the river Des Moines" is a translation of the French phrase, "les rapides de la rivière Des Moines," and that it was so intended by the convention, and meant the "Des Moines rapids." After attaching this construction to the constitution of the State, which was adopted among the French population, and therefore had a sort of French origin, they then refer back to the act of Congress, and make the same construction attach to that instrument, the origin of which was clearly and purely English. But I am unwilling to submit to this. The committee must admit that the act of Congress is purely of English origin. If so, the phrase "the rapids of the river Des Moines," used in the act, is not even a translation from the French. And if it was used in the act of Congress without being a translation from the French, it is fair to presume it was used in the constitution without being a translation from the French also; and if so, it had no reference to the phrase by which the "Des Moines rapids" in the Mississippi were designated in French. The convention consisted of forty members, two of whom were Frenchmen—and thirty-eight Americans, mostly Virginians and Kentuckians—a people who would not readily adopt a French idiom in any part of America. As, then, no rapids in the Mississippi river are called "the rapids of the river Des Moines," and as this expression is not of French origin, we must not place these rapids in the Mississippi river, but leave them in the Des Moines river, to which they properly belong.

A letter of Pierre Chouteau, jr., in reply to a letter of Lieutenant Lea, has been referred to in his report, and the committee seems to have extracted from that report. He says: "Yours of the 15th instant requests me to state by what appellation the Des Moines and Rock river rapids 'of' the Mississippi are generally known among the French inhabitants of the country. In reply, I beg to state that I have never known them designated otherwise than as 'les rapides de la rivière Des Moines' and 'les rapides de la rivière de la Roche.'" I have no doubt this is so, and yet I do not know it, although a Missourian; and I think I hazard very little in saying, that not a single member of Congress knew it when the act was passed authorizing the people of Missouri to form a State constitution. If so, they described the boundaries of the intended State without any reference to the French name of the rapids in the Mississippi river; and no doubt, in using the same language, the convention did the same thing. Mr. Chouteau does not say that the convention called for rapids in the Mississippi river. In his letter there is no such assertion.

But another item of evidence given by the committee in their report, to show that the convention called for the "Des Moines rapids" in the Mississippi river, is, that, "as early as 1799, the French governor-general granted to Louis Honore a tract of land, to adjoin 'aux rapides de la rivière des Moines,' and the validity of this grant, upon this descriptive call, has been affirmed by Congress within the last few years." See page 10, report of 1842. This piece of testimony is of the same character with the other—only weaker, being built upon the other. Congress confirmed the grant to Louis Honore, because the rapids in the Mississippi were called by the French "aux rapides de la rivière des Moines;" and the committee now introduces this confirmation as further evidence that the rapids were so called. The confirmation proves no such thing. But admit these rapids were so called, and it does not prove that "the rapids of the river Des Moines" are the "Des Moines rapids" of the Mississippi. Just as well might you say that "the rapids in the river Des Moines" are the "Des Moines rapids" of the Mississippi. The language is of precisely the same import. But a confirmation of a title to a small tract of land is by no means conclusive evidence that the claimant was entitled to the land. It is well known, and unfortunate, too, that the best claims are sometimes neglected by Congress, while the most iniquitous are sometimes granted. The "Des Moines rapids" are in the Mississippi river, and are known by that name; but these are one rapids, and "the rapids of the river Des Moines" another, and a totally different and distinct rapids, to be found in another and a totally different and distinct place.

The rapids in the Mississippi river had a distinct name, by which they were well known. Your committee says, by the French, they "were known by the name 'les rapides de la rivière des Moines;'" "by the Americans, they were called the 'Des Moines rapids.'" "Both these phrases are names, and not descriptions," says the committee. See report 1842, page 10. This is true: they are names; and these names were well known to many persons, and had been for many years, before the State Government was formed. Now, if the convention had intended to refer to these rapids, would they not have used one or the other of these names? If they had wanted to call for these rapids, is it possible that, out of forty members, the most intelligent men in the country, not one of them knew the name of a rapids so noted as the committee represents this to be? Is it not incredible, if they intended to refer to these rapids, that they should have dropped the true name in both languages, and have used a name by which these rapids were never known, either before or afterwards? Would they not have used the very name by which the rapids were known? Would they not have made the matter still more certain, by saying "the Des Moines rapids" in the Mississippi river? This would have fixed the rapids beyond all dispute in the Mississippi river; and how perfectly "easy" this would have been.

The convention did not use either one or the other of these names; the convention used no name—and for the very best reason in the world they used no name: that is, because the rapids which they referred to had no name. They were but little known. They were high up in a wilderness. An occasional hunter had seen them; the trappers had sometimes passed them in their canoes; perhaps a few traders had seen them; and the surveyor, John C. Sullivan, had seen them. He had surveyed the Indian boundary in 1816, four years before the convention was held. When the convention met, they called upon him and other gentlemen for information about the rapids: so we learn from the remaining members of that convention—and perhaps they know something more about it than our committee. Sullivan was prepared to give them the information wanted. The rapids which he had visited were but about nine miles, or, as the witness says, but "a short distance north of the Indian boundary line." These were at the Great Bend. The country was wholly new. This was, no doubt, the first public notice which had ever been taken of these rapids. Of course, then, they had no name. The convention used them as if they had no name, and were noticed in a public manner for the first time. It was certainly not known then that there were any other rapids in the Des Moines river above. It is not possible to magnify anything into a rapids which can be found below. The phrase "the rapids of the river Des Moines" was used as a description, and not as a name. Of course, the description belongs only to rapids in the Des Moines river. It could not describe the rapids in the Mississippi river.

"Les rapides de la rivière Des Moines." "The Des Moines rapids." By the first, the French, and by the latter, the Americans, called the rapids in the Mississippi river. "Both these phrases are names, and not descriptions." So says our committee; and in this they are correct. These names are quoted wherever we find them. So are all names made up of phrases; and especially when of long use and standing, they are almost invariably used as quotations. It is probable that this practice of quoting names and phrases has been followed nowhere more closely than by our convention in forming the constitution of Missouri. Even the words and phrases, "Senate," "House of Representatives," "General Assembly," "Supreme Court," "Chancellor," "circuit courts," "State of Missouri," "against the peace and dignity of the State," "great seal of the State of Missouri;" all these are marked in the constitution as quotations. And yet the phrase, "the rapids of the river Des Moines," is not used in the constitution as a quotation; and it is evident, therefore, that the convention did not use it as a name. If they had translated it from the French, they would have used it as a quotation more readily than ever. If they had used it as an awkward stagger for the "Des Moines rapids" in the Mississippi river, they would still have used it as a quotation, under the supposition that they had staggered upon the right name. But they did not use it as a quotation, and of course not as a name, but merely as a description. The term "Des Moines rapids" would have been used and quoted as a name, because it was a name of long standing, and well known. But the committee stultify themselves in attempting to stultify our convention. They ought to believe that the convention meant what they said, and said what they meant, and knew what they were doing.

The history of this matter shows that there was nothing French about it—not even a translation of the name of the rapids of the Mississippi river. The words used in the constitution, in describing the boundaries of Missouri, are the same as the words used in the act of Congress for that purpose. The act of Congress, I have stated before, was drawn up in this place, by the honorable John Scott, who was then the Delegate in this House from the Territory of Missouri, and who, with the aid of the committee, gave birth and origin to the act, and to the memorable phrase, "the rapids of the river Des Moines;" and particularly to the use of the memorable "of," which has played so conspicuous a part in all this difficulty. It would be rather awkward to say "the rapids in the river Des Moines" in the Mississippi river; and yet the expression, "the rapids of the river Des Moines" of the Mississippi river, is of precisely the same character and import. And this latter, according to the committee, is the mode of expression used by the convention, only made complete. But neither the Congress which passed the act, nor the convention which adopted the constitution, was the place in which to find such an awkward use, or such an abuse, of our language, as the committee are disposed to fasten upon them.

Besides all this, "the Des Moines rapids" of the Mississippi river were unfit to fix a boundary. They were too long. To call for them to fix the northern boundary, was like calling for the Mississippi river itself. A whole range of counties would have been left in uncertainty by such a call. The convention wanted a point to run to, not a line as long as some of our States. They never called for a line fourteen miles long, instead of a point but eighty yards long. A rapids, eighteen inches deep, falling two feet in eighty yards, with a swift current, but eighty yards long, six hundred feet wide, falling perpendicularly as much as ten or twelve inches, for three or four hundred feet of the width of the stream, is as good a point, and as prominent a monument, as any State could ask to fix her boundary. And this is the description of the rapids at the Great Bend, and a true one. The convention would not have left a point so suitable as this, and have taken a rapids fourteen miles long.

But "the Des Moines rapids" of the Mississippi river are "upwards of fourteen miles long." They "have had great notoriety since the date of the first settlements above them, and, during the period that Louisiana was held by the French, were known." So says the committee. If, then, the convention had called for them, they would have ascertained their magnitude, and their "fourteen miles of length" and upwards. If they had done so, is it not incredible to suppose that they would have left the north boundary "dancing" through this distance of fourteen miles, when, in one word more, they could have said the line shall run through the lower end, the middle, or the upper end, of "the Des Moines rapids" of the Mississippi river? But they said no such thing. Is it not incredible, then, to suppose they could have meant any such thing? Does anybody believe they did?

Congress wanted "natural and striking objects of great notoriety and magnitude" in fixing the boundaries. So says the committee. If this was all they wanted, and they were regardless of the size and shape of the State, the mouth of the Des Moines was the very thing. This was only one mile and a half south of the "Des Moines rapids," and was a "prominent monument" and a notable point. It is strange the convention did not fix on this, in preference to a rapids fourteen miles in length, if they were regardless of the shape and size of the State. But they were not regardless of these things. The honorable John Scott says they wanted to make "the Missouri river run through the centre of the State from west to east." This was natural enough, and no doubt the feelings of the whole convention. A memorial of the Legislature of the Territory of Missouri prayed for a line on the parallel of latitude passing through the mouth of Rock river. Then they would have struck the Des Moines sixty or seventy miles above the mouth, if not more. For want of information, it was impossible for them to be entirely accurate; and they might still have failed to get an equal amount of territory on each side of the Missouri river.

The expression "down the middle of the main fork of the Des Moines" is used in the Constitution. "The main fork" was used to mean something. It must have been known there was no fork near the mouth. The hunters and trappers had no doubt been up the river some distance. Sullivan and his party had not travelled up the river, but had gone across the country from the Indian boundary to the rapids. He may have believed another branch of the river put in at the northern point of the Great Bend. But near the mouth of the Des Moines it must have been well known there was no fork; and the convention had information, no doubt, that there was no fork within any short distance of the mouth—certainly not within the reach even of the upper end of the "Des Moines rapids" of the Mississippi river. If so, then the convention did not call for these rapids, but for a point much higher up the Des Moines river, and above the "fork" of that river, as they supposed.

The committee, in the report of 1840, says: "It is preposterous to suppose that Congress, after acting with so much precision on all the other lines of Missouri, should leave the northern one dancing about between four or five unknown, nameless, and inconsiderable rapids, over a breadth of fifty miles of country, the extent of which was then unknown." "Unknown, nameless, and inconsiderable rapids." They were "unknown;" and this is the very reason why the precise rapids were not designated. We have no evidence that the convention knew of the existence of any more than one rapids in the river Des Moines when the constitution was formed, and the north boundary was not intended to be left "dancing" between several rapids; yet, unfortunately, such seems to have been the case, from our recent surveys. But, as we claim the lowest rapids in the river, it is not very important that we were ignorant of the existence of any above them. The discovery of these additional rapids will hardly change our boundary, and drive us from the Des Moines into the Mississippi, if we were entitled to rapids in the former river originally.

The committee says, in the report of 1842, that the people of Missouri Territory, in their petition to be admitted into the Union, "indicate, generally, to Congress, a boundary for their future State; and they urge, both with good sense and force, its adoption by Congress, on the ground that it would 'include all the country to the north and west to which the Indian title had been extinguished;' and yet the line to which Missouri now claims is considerably to the north of what then formed the Indian cession." [See page 6.] We admit all this; and if it be true that the people of the Territory thus petitioned, then we offer this fact, and the fact that the northern boundary of the State is not required to correspond with the north Indian boundary, as another evidence that this Indian boundary was not intended to be the State boundary. The convention, have no doubt, intended to make the meridian line on which the western State boundary runs, and the western Indian boundary line, correspond, so far as to make them run upon the same track; because the impression was, that they did run upon the same track. I admit they failed to do so. If they had intended the Indian boundary north to be the State boundary north, they would of course have required these two lines to correspond also. But the convention did not require these two lines to correspond; and it is, therefore, clear that they did not intend this Indian boundary to be the State boundary. Then, where did they intend to put the State boundary? Your committee says, the people of the Territory petitioned for "all the country to the north and west to which the Indian title had been extinguished." If so, they would not themselves, by their convention, have adopted a boundary south of the old Indian boundary, including less territory than they prayed for. By doing so, they would not have "included all the country to the north and west to which the Indian title had been extinguished." Then, the convention could not have intended to fix the northern boundary south of the old Indian boundary. If so, it follows that the State boundary cannot call for the "Des Moines rapids," in the Mississippi river; because, even the upper end of these rapids are several miles south of the Indian boundary. If the convention did not intend the Indian boundary to be the State boundary, (and this they clearly did not intend,) and if the convention did not intend to locate this boundary south of the old Indian boundary, (and this, just as clearly, they did not intend,) then it follows that they located the State boundary north of the old Indian boundary.

I regret that I have not been able to see this petition to which your committee refers. A close examination of it might throw some additional light on this subject. If I understand the committee correctly, they say the petitioners asked for all the country "to which the Indian title had been extinguished;" but they do not say that the petitioners ask for no more country than that "to which the Indian title had been extinguished;" and yet they leave the impression that the petitioners did ask for no more, and that they acted "both with good sense and force" in asking for no more. I have not been able to find this petition; and I regret that I have not, because I have a memorial on this subject, of a character very different from that petition; and a memorial, too, from the highest authority in the Territory. It is the memorial of the Legislature of the Territory of Missouri, adopted at St. Louis, the 22d day of November, 1818, a little more than a year before the act of Congress was passed to authorize the people of the Territory to form a constitution and State government; and this memorial was referred to the select committee which draughted said act of Congress, on the 8th day of December, 1819—but a little more than three months before said act of Congress was passed. It is hardly probable that anything of a later date, on this subject, was presented to Congress. Now, this memorial, in describing the boundaries prayed for by the people of the Territory, says: "Thence, due north, to a point due west of the MOUTH OF ROCK RIVER; thence, due east, to the middle of the main channel of the Mississippi, OPPOSITE THE MOUTH OF ROCK RIVER." (See Executive Papers, vol. 1, 1st sess. 16th Congress, doc. No. 4. This memorial will be found as quoted, and at the place referred to.) The boundary here prayed for is even north of the parallel of latitude running through the rapids of the river Des Moines, at the Great Bend in said river. It is clear, from this memorial, that the wish and the general sense of the people of the Territory was, that the northern boundary of the State should be located north of the old Indian boundary.

At that early day, when the country was hardly known, and when the territory prayed for was deemed of little or no value, and when this Government was as anxious to foster the interests and grant the prayers of Missouri as she is now to countenance the demands and to aid the encroachments and to encourage the groundless pretensions of Iowa, Congress would not have hesitated to grant the territory which the people petitioned for. If I am asked why the act of Congress and the constitution of the State did not call for the precise boundaries prayed for in this memorial, and especially for the mouth of Rock river, I answer, by giving the words of the honorable John Scott, who was then our Delegate in Congress, and who drew up the act of Congress, and who was also in the convention which formed the constitution of the State. He says that, at the time the act was passed, he conversed with several, who had some knowledge of the country, about the boundaries; "and they all concurred that it would be useless to embrace that part of the country that would lie between the river Des Moines and the Mississippi, as it was a mere gore—a low willow bar between the Mississippi and Des Moines river, as they said, running nearly parallel for some sixty miles." (H. Doc. 48, p. 8, 2d sess., 27th Congress.) For this reason, the act of Congress did not call for the mouth of Rock river, but stopped the northern boundary at the rapids of the river Des Moines. In adopting the constitution, the convention followed the act of Congress, by using the same language in describing the boundaries. The boundary prayed for in this memorial annihilates the idea that the "Des Moines rapids," in the Mississippi river, were called for to fix the parallel of latitude on which the northern boundary was to run. If any object, not in the northern line itself, had been called for to fix that line, it would, under this memorial, have been the mouth of Rock river, and not the rapids at the mouth of the Des Moines river.

The committee have dragged into their report the recent legislation of Congress, the legislation of Missouri, old and new Indian treaties, old and new maps and map-makers, and all other sorts of rubbish conceivable. I have neither time nor inclination now to undertake the useless task of wading through all this trash.

The boundaries of Missouri were fixed by her constitution. With this constitution fixing her boundaries, Congress admitted the State into the Union. By this admission, Congress sanctioned the boundaries adopted by the State. As these boundaries were fixed originally, so they remain to this day, except where they have been altered by consent of both parties—the State and the United States—in a legal and constitutional manner. By a simple act, Congress can give her consent to alter a boundary. Not so with the State of Missouri. Her boundaries are part of her constitutional law. They can be altered only as she alters her constitution, and in but one of two ways: 1st, by a convention; 2d, by a vote of two-thirds of each branch of the Legislature at two successive sessions. This has never been done except in one case, and that case not in reference to the territory now in dispute. The western boundary, on the north side of the Missouri river, was so changed as to take the Platte country into the State. This was done by changing our constitution, and then getting an act of Congress approving that change. Our boundaries, then, stand to this day just as they were fixed originally, with the exception named.

It will be useless, then, to trouble the committee by examining Indian treaties, the legislation of Congress in forming land districts, the legislation of Missouri in forming new counties, the action of blundering treaty-makers, or the maps of still more blundering map-makers, who have never succeeded in giving accurately even the boundaries of all our counties, and even where they have been designated by range, township, and sectional lines; much less the boundaries of the State, which we not only concede, but contend, were never defined and run and marked till recently. Blundering in legislating, in treaty-making, and map-making, cannot alter our constitutional boundaries. I shall pass over all this rubbish, then, and devote my limited time to more important matters.

The committee determines on the old Indian boundary as the State boundary. This is not, and cannot be, the State boundary; because it is not a parallel of latitude, and the State boundary is a parallel of latitude. And further: it is not, and cannot be, the State boundary; because the State boundary is a parallel of latitude passing through "the rapids of the river Des Moines;" and no parallel of latitude which touches any part of the north Indian boundary line can touch any "rapids of the river Des Moines," or any part of the "Des Moines rapids" in the Mississippi river. If the convention had intended the Indian boundary to be the State boundary north, they would have said so, and would have required the Indian boundary and the State boundary to correspond. A failure to do so, is conclusive evidence that they did not intend the Indian boundary to be the State boundary on the north. Besides, the Committee on Territories admit, in their reports both of 1840 and 1842, that the Indian boundary line is not the State boundary line. (See pages 8 and 11, H. Doc. 2, 1840; and page 11, H. Doc. 791, 1842.)

Let us next examine the western boundary. This is not without its difficulty, too; yet there is none of a character very serious about it. The meridian line on which the western boundary runs, is required to correspond with the Indian boundary. The Indian boundary runs from a point on the north bank of the Missouri river, opposite the mouth of the Kansas river, one hundred miles north. It is urged that this correspondence will arrest the western boundary of the State at the end of the Indian boundary line, and that the northern boundary must start eastward from this point. This is not so. The mistake originates in confounding the correspondence required between the Indian boundary and the meridian line, with a correspondence between the Indian boundary and the western boundary of the State. In this matter the committee and myself, for once, agree.

I said it was not the Indian boundary and the western boundary which were to correspond, but the Indian boundary and the meridian line on which the western boundary runs. And this distinction will be found important in settling this point. The difficulty in reference to the western boundary is in these words: "making the said line correspond with the Indian boundary line." "Said line." What line do these words refer to?

In describing the boundaries, the words "said line" are once used, and the words "Indian boundary line" are once used; and the word "line" is nowhere else used in the description, except where it is qualified by the word "meridian," making in a "meridian line." Of the correctness of this assertion anybody will be convinced by an inspection of the act of Congress, and of the first article of the constitution of Missouri. Let us begin to read at the southwestern corner of the State. The boundary runs "thence, from the point aforesaid, north, along the said meridian line, to the intersection of the parallel of latitude which passes through the rapids of the river Des Moines, making the said line correspond with the Indian boundary line." What line do the words "said line" refer to? They must refer to some "line" mentioned in the preceding part of the law. If so, then they must refer to the "meridian line passing through the middle of the mouth of the Kansas river, where the same empties into the Missouri river." Of course they do refer to this, because no other line is mentioned in the law. However badly the description may be expressed, if badly expressed, still the language used is grammatical and accurate; and we must take it as we find it, and construe it accordingly.

What is meant by making this "meridian line" and the "Indian boundary line" correspond? Are they to begin together? Are they to run on the same track? Are they to terminate at the same point? If so, they will never correspond, because in neither of these particulars do they agree, and never can.

To get the idea here to be conveyed, will require a little attention from those who do not understand the direction of the Missouri and the Kansas rivers. To be short, the former runs southeast, and the latter northeast. The "meridian line" runs through the middle of the mouth of the Kansas river. A line from the "middle of the mouth of the Kansas river," running north, would run diagonally across the Missouri, and strike the bank of that river above a point which would be opposite the middle of the mouth of the Kansas river. The "Indian boundary line" starts on the bank of the Missouri river, opposite the "middle of the mouth of the Kansas river." The starting-point, then, of the Indian boundary line, is below the point where our "meridian line" strikes the north bank of the Missouri river. In a stream as wide as the Missouri, this difference may be one or two miles, or more, depending upon the directions of the two rivers. But there is a difference: no matter how great or how little, it is a difference; and therefore the two lines do not correspond in starting together. Each line runs due north, and therefore must be nearly parallel, and consequently they do not run together. Then they do not correspond by running on the same track. Nor do the two lines correspond by terminating at the same point. The "Indian boundary line" runs one hundred miles north, and stops. The meridian line cannot be cut short. It runs to the north pole, in defiance of either legislation or construction. These lines, then, correspond neither in beginning at the same point, in running on the same track, nor in stopping at the same point. If there be any correspondence, it is only in running parallel; and thus far they do almost correspond But to make the western boundary correspond exactly with the "Indian boundary line," it would have to leave the "meridian line" in "the middle of the mouth of the Kansas river," and run directly across the Missouri river to the opposite bank, in a direction nearly northeast, till it struck the beginning of the "Indian boundary line," and from thence directly north with the "Indian boundary line." No construction of the act of Congress, or of the constitution of Missouri, can require this. Then, there is no correspondence except in running virtually parallel; and therefore the starting-point of the northern boundary is not affected by the correspondence required between the Indian boundary and the meridian line, on which the western boundary is required to run.

The honorable gentleman from Iowa [Mr. A. C DODGE] has invoked the spirit of abolition against us. This was useless and wrong. The two subjects have no affinity. This question should be decided upon its own merits. He says the people in the disputed territory will never live in the State of Missouri, "on account of their repugnance to the institution of domestic slavery." This may or may not be so. In 1831, the Legislature of Missouri asserted her claim to the disputed territory, and memoralized Congress to have the boundary run. The country in dispute then belonged to the Indians, and was not ceded to the United States till 1832, one year afterwards. The white settlements commenced there after this time, and after they knew that Missouri claimed the country; and of course they settled there, determined, like good citizens, to abide the result of the case. Many of them may have expected to be in Missouri as soon as this case was determined. But admit that this is not so. Admit that the people in the territory are all Abolitionists, if the gentleman prefers it. Will this alter the law fixing the boundary of the State? Will this change the constitution of the State, as sanctioned by the act of Congress admitting the State into the Union? Surely not. Will it change the facts of the case? Surely not. Then why invoke the spirit of abolition? Let the case be decided according to the law and the facts. You will act wrong to decide it otherwise.

The honorable gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. G. DAVIS] invokes the spirit of cupidity against us. He says the lands belonging to the half-breed Sac and Fox Indians are bounded on the north by an extension of the northern boundary of Missouri to the Mississippi river; and if the northern boundary of the State is north of the old Indian boundary, then the half-breeds will be entitled to more land. The gentleman, although he has made two reports upon this subject, seems yet to have wholly mistaken the nature of the question. It is not a question of expediency, or of dollars and cents; it is a question of law and of fact; and if you attempt to cheat the Indians out of what they are entitled to, by first cheating Missouri out of the boundary she is entitled to, still you will fail to accomplish your object. If you have bounded their lands by the north boundary of Missouri, and not by the old Indian boundary, you cannot force them to take the Indian boundary instead of the State boundary, merely by attempting to put the State boundary where legally it does not exist, and never can run. Suppose you fix the northern boundary of the State on the Indian boundary, when it is not there: will that cut the Indians out of their right to the true State boundary, if they are entitled to the State boundary? Surely not. No court of justice would decide so; and even if we make the magnanimous attempt, we shall still fail to cheat the Indians out of the boundary to which they are entitled. They will hold the lands which you have vested in them, in defiance of any subsequent legislation of yours. But, admitting that this Government could obtain some lands by cheating the half-breeds: would that be a ground for attempting to alter the constitutional boundaries of Missouri? Surely not; and such an argument ought not to be urged or countenanced.

Both of these honorable gentlemen invoke the spirit of prejudice against our claim. They urge that Missouri is already a large State—a great State—a giant State. Admit all this. She has a fruitful soil and a healthy climate. She abounds in the richest minerals, and has the finest navigable streams in the world. She has clear springs, and rich groves, and healthy hills, and verdant valleys, and the most beautiful prairies on the face of the earth. She has a large territory, and a population increasing with astonishing rapidity, and must, at no distant day, be one of the first States in the Union. She is not in debt. Admit all this, and that this flattering picture does not equal the reality; and still this will not change our rights, or compensate Missouri for the loss of part of her territory. These things do not impair her claim. She is not censurable for their existence. She cannot prevent it. Missouri was created for a mighty empire, and cannot fail to fulfil her destiny, if not oppressed too much by legislation. If let alone, her citizens will work their way to wealth, to happiness, to prosperity, and to greatness. But her extent and immense natural advantages do not change her boundaries. They are now as they stood originally; and must so remain, until they are altered, with the consent, not only of this Government, but of the State Government also. Then, not even the spirit of prejudice should be invoked against us. Give us a fair decision.

The honorable gentleman from Iowa charges us with grasping for more territory. This is a mistake. We would not willingly encroach upon our neighbor. We feel a deep interest in her welfare and prosperity, and in her improvement and advancement to the dignity of a State, and of a member of the Confederacy. But she has ample territory, and enough to spare for two more States. Iowa is encroaching on us, and grasping part of our territory; and the United States, like all tender mothers, is taking sides with her infant child against the older one, in sustaining her groundless pretensions. This course is well enough with children; but we are engaged in no child's play We are in earnest in asserting our rights. We do not ask for more territory. We claim that which is already our own. To this we are entitled. This we intend to have. We ask you to examine our case impartially, if you can. If you cannot, as impartially as you can. Do not charge us with grasping what is not our own. The territory we claim is our own. You will find it so, when you examine the case. Weigh the law and the facts of our case for yourselves, and then give us such a decision, on the law and the facts, as would be given in any court of justice. We ask for nothing more; we will submit to nothing less.

[The following speech was made at the 2d session of the 27th Congress, as will be seen by its date; but it was not written out by the member and delivered to us until after the Appendix for that session was completed, which will account for its appearance in this volume.]

SPEECH OF MR. A. H. H. STUART,

OF VIRGINIA,

In the House of Representatives, July 7, 1842—On the bill "to provide revenue from imports, and to change and modify existing laws imposing duties on imports, and for other purposes."

The bill being under consideration in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. ALEXANDER H. H. STUART, of Virginia, rose and said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Nothing could be more gratifying to my feelings than to witness the calm and forbearing temper in which this debate has thus far been conducted. Heretofore, the introduction of a tariff bill, of any character, into the House of Representatives, has been the signal for the display of the most violent partisan feelings and narrow sectional prejudices; but, upon this occasion, the discussion has been characterized by a spirit of courtesy and liberality which, I am sure, the whole country will join me in applauding as highly honorable to the Representatives of a free and enlightened people.

In the few remarks which I propose to submit, I shall endeavor to follow the good example of those who have preceded me. I shall speak my own sentiments with all becoming frankness and candor; but I trust I shall not so far forget the obligations of decorum and parliamentary propriety as to assail rudely the feelings, the motives, or the opinions of those who are opposed to me. Freedom of discussion, and toleration of opinion, are two of the vital principles of our Republican institutions; and I will ever be among the last to disturb or destroy either of them.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the bill now under consideration, when its provisions and purposes are rightly understood, admits of but little debate. If I understand it correctly, it is simply a revenue bill. It is not, in the ordinary acceptation of the term, a bill for protection. It comes to us under the auspices of the Committee of Ways and Means. Its purpose is to raise just so much money as will be necessary to defray the expenses of the Government, administered with all practicable economy; and, as subordinate to this primary consideration, it proposes, incidentally, to afford protection to the great agricultural, manufacturing, and commercial interests of the country. The question of protection per se, as something substantive and distinct from revenue, does not arise under it; and I shall, therefore, not deem it necessary on this occasion to discuss the merits of that policy. In my opinion, that question is not likely soon to arise; for I know no member of either House of Congress who desires any protection to either of the great interests of the country, beyond what will be afforded by a well-adjusted revenue tariff. But if there be any who go further, I wish to announce distinctly, in the outset, that I am not one of them.

I will not go for raising, by a tariff, a single dollar more than the wants of the Government, economically administered, require. But, in laying that tariff, I will be at all times willing and desirous so to discriminate between the articles imported as to foster and protect our home labor and home productions, against foreign labor and foreign productions.

I have said, sir, that this question lies within narrow limits. The principal difficulties in regard to it arise from not having a clear perception of the true issues involved, and from confounding collateral and extraneous matters with them. In order to get at the proper points of inquiry, I propose to separate the undisputed propositions connected with the subject from those that are controverted. This will simplify the matter, and enable us to pursue our investigations with much more facility. What points, then, are undisputed?

1st. All agree that it is the duty of Government to raise, in some manner, money enough to defray its current expenses, and to pay, in suitable instalments, the debts it may owe.

2d. All agree that there are, under the provisions of the Constitution, but three modes of raising revenue, viz: by imposts, by excises, and by direct taxation.

3d. A large majority, if not every member of this House, will agree that the revenue ought not to be raised by a direct tax on land, nor by that system of excises which Mr. Jefferson denounced as an "infernal system, which should never have found a place in our Constitution." The only remaining way of raising revenue is by a system of imposts or duties on foreign merchandise—the system which was devised by the first Congress at its first session, and which has prevailed without interruption from that time to the present day.

I may, then, venture to assume it to be the sense of Congress and the nation that the revenue which we need is to be raised by imposing duties or taxes on foreign goods imported into this country.

We have next to ascertain how much money is necessary. Upon this subject we have the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury and of the Committee of Ways and Means, and the opinions of the most enlightened of our statesmen, showing that the current expenditures of the Government for the next three years will be from twenty-two to twenty-four millions per annum; and that, in addition to that amount, three and a half millions will be necessary to pay the interest on the public debt, and to provide a suitable sinking fund for the ultimate payment of the principal. These estimates, and the data on which they are founded, have been furnished to the country in official documents, and in various speeches which have been delivered on this floor; and, as no one has pretended to show that they are incorrect, I shall not undertake now to enter into an examination of them, but will assume that they present a fair statement of the amount which the Government will require. And here I will take occasion to say, that this estimate falls, by several millions, below the average annual expenditure of Mr. Van Buren's administration, which was $28,098,965.

Twenty-seven millions being thus shown to be necessary to supply the wants of the Government, the present bill has been carefully framed by the Committee of Ways and Means, after mature consideration of the views of the Secretary of the Treasury and of the Committee on Manufactures, to produce that amount. No gentleman has, during the course of this debate, ventured to say that it will produce more than twenty-seven millions; but many have expressed the belief that it will not yield that much. The friends of the bill cannot, therefore, be charged with any purpose of going beyond the point necessary for revenue.

We now come to the great principle involved in this bill. It resolves itself into this: Shall the revenue be levied by a horizontal system of ad valorem duties, operating alike upon all articles; or shall there be a just system of discrimination, with a view to the protection of our own industry in all its departments?

In this question two distinct points of inquiry are embraced. 1st. Has the Government the constitutional power to make such discrimination? 2d. If the Government does possess that power, is it expedient to exercise it?

If the first question is decided in the negative, there is no necessity for prosecuting the matter further; for if the power is not conferred upon Congress by the Constitution, no considerations of expediency, however urgent, can ever justify its exercise.

The power of discrimination, to some extent, is conceded by the sternest opponents of the general doctrine. All admit, for example, that gold and silver shall be allowed to pass through our custom-houses free of duty. A large majority of both parties are also in favor of a like exemption of tea and coffee. To these instances they seem to have paid no attention, because they are of a negative character: yet, surely, they embody the principle of discrimination just as much as if they paid higher instead of lower duties than other articles. Whilst, however, gentlemen concede the principle in these cases, they deny the right to discriminate with a view to protect our home productions.

The general question of the constitutional power of Congress to have regard, in laying duties upon imports, to our domestic interest, has been so often and so ably discussed, that nothing new can be said upon it; and I shall, therefore, not make the attempt. The arguments for and against the power have been spread over the country, and are accessible to all who wish to examine the subject. But I have recently met with a view of the question, by a man, in abilities, one of the first of the age, in an address to the American people on behalf of a convention held in New York in 1831, which is so condensed, so forcible, so conclusive, that I cannot deny myself the pleasure of submitting an extract from it for the consideration of the committee.

"By the Constitution, Congress has power 'to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises.' It has power, also, 'to regulate commerce with foreign nations.'

"The power to lay duties is accompanied by one express qualification or limitation; which is, 'that all duties shall be uniform throughout the United States.' The power to regulate commerce has its limitation also; which is, that no regulation of commerce shall give preference to the ports of one State over those of another. And there is another limitation, which may apply to both clauses—namely, that no export duty shall ever be laid.

"Here, then, is a grant of power in broad and general terms, but with certain specific limitations, carefully expressed. But neither of these limitations applies in any manner to that exercise of the power which is now under consideration. Neither of them, nor any other clause or word in the whole Constitution, manifests the slightest intention to restrain the words so as to prohibit Congress from laying duties for protection. The attempt is nothing less than to add a restriction which the Constitution has omitted. Who has authority to add this? If other restrictions had been intended, they would have been expressed. When the business of limitation was before the convention, what was omitted was as much an exercise of intention as what was expressed. It stated all the restraints on Congress which it intended; and to impose others now would be, not to interpret the Constitution, but to change it; not to construe the existing instrument, but to make another.

"The words of the grant being general—to lay duties and to regulate commerce—their meaning is to be ascertained by reference to the common use and import of language. No unusual signification is to be given to the terms, either to restrain or enlarge their import. Congress, in its discretion, is to lay duties and to regulate trade for all the objects and purposes for which duties are ordinarily laid, and trade ordinarily regulated. If such a thing was never before heard of as laying duties and regulating trade with a view to encourage manufactures, then it might be said that the convention did not contemplate such an exercise of the power by Congress. But it was perfectly known to the convention, and to the people of this country, that one leading object with all Governments, in laying duties and regulating trade, was, and for a long time had been, the encouragement of manufactures. This was emphatically true of England, whose language the convention spoke, and whose legal and legislative phraseology was theirs also. Every leading state of Europe was, at that moment, regulating its commerce for purposes of this nature. Such a purpose, indeed, had been long sought to be accomplished by some of the States themselves, by their own regulations of trade. Massachusetts had attempted it, New York had attempted it, Virginia had attempted it, and we believe other States had done the same. How ineffectual all their attempts were, for want of union and a general system, was soon seen and felt by the whole country; but they show to what ends, and to what uses, the power to regulate trade was understood to extend. But not only in other nations, and in the States, before the adoption of the present Constitution, as we shall have occasion to show hereafter, but in the United States since, and in the administration of this very Constitution, regulations of trade have been made, in almost innumerable instances, with no view to revenue, but with a sole and exclusive regard to protection.

"If our understanding of the Constitution be not according to its true meaning, that instrument has been grossly violated from the very beginning. What are all the registry acts, what the bounties on the fisheries, but so many avowed efforts to protect American industry, under the power of regulating trade? On what foundation does the whole system of the coasting trade stand? The American shipbuilder and ship-owner has enjoyed, from the first, (and we think properly,) not only protection in that trade, but the monopoly of it. He shuts out all foreign competition; and he does so on the ground that the public good is promoted by giving him this advantage. We think he is right in asking this, and the Government right in granting it. Yet this is not free trade; it is preference—it is protection; and protection of a manufacture, under the power to regulate trade. The laws giving this protection to the manufacture and the use of ships may be wise, and laws protecting other manufactures may be unwise. But the first cannot be constitutional, and the latter not constitutional. If there be power for one, there is power for both. Both are drawn from the same grant, both operate by the same general means, and both regard the same object—the protection, namely, of American labor and capital against foreign competition. If it be said that the navigation act is founded in national policy, and that it is essential to national defence and national independence; we admit it. But we answer, in the first place, that Congress could not exercise a power not granted, merely because it might be useful or necessary; and, in the second place, we say that the same remark is true of the policy of protecting manufactures. That policy, also, is essential to national independence. Iron, hemp, and clothing for sailors and soldiers, are not less indispensable to national defence than ships and seamen. Not only in the general use of language, then, does the power of laying duties and regulating trade extend to the protection, by the use of such means, of domestic manufactures, but such has been the constant interpretation of the Constitution itself.

"We think, indeed, that when a general power is given to Congress by the Constitution of the United States, in plain and unambiguous words, their acts are constitutional and valid, if they are within the scope of the granted power; and that, in considering the validity of the law, the motives of the legislature can never be investigated. Having granted the power, with such limits expressed as were thought proper, its exercise within those limits is left to the discretion of Congress.

"What is the true character of the opposite doctrine? It is, that the constitutionality of a law depends, not on its provisions and enactments, but on the motives of those who passed it. Is not such a notion new? How are we to ascertain the motives of a legislature? By private inquiry; by public examination; by conjecture? The law may be passed on mixed motives—some members voting for revenue, some for protection; or one House may act with one view, and the other House with another. What will be the character of such a law?

"According to this new theory, if the motives be constitutional, then the act is; if the motives be unconstitutional, then the act is unconstitutional also. It follows, therefore, that a law passed by one Congress may be constitutional, which, if passed by another, though in the same words, would be unconstitutional. Besides, on this theory a law may be unconstitutional for its omissions as well as its enactments; because, in laying duties, articles may be omitted, as well as articles inserted, from a design to favor manufactures."

Here we have a view of the question which seems to me to be unanswerable.

But, Mr. Chairman, I beg the attention of the committee whilst I proceed to examine into the origin and history of this doctrine of protection of American labor and industry. Is it a novel assumption of power by Congress? Is it a new system of policy, which is now sought to be established, in opposition to the ancient practice of the Government? So far from such being the fact, I affirm that the doctrine is coeval with the Constitution itself, and that the policy is sanctioned and sustained by the direct opinions and practice of every President of the United States, and of all the leading statesmen of the country, from the days of George Washington to the present time.

If my time permitted, I might prove to you, by the most authentic histories of our Government, that the necessity of protecting our home industry from foreign aggression contributed more than any other cause to the formation and adoption of the Constitution of the United States. The consideration of that topic would, however, lead me into too wide a field of discussion; and I must, therefore, content myself with barely adverting to it, and pass on to the history of the action of the Government under the Constitution.

The first Congress assembled in Philadelphia on the 4th of March, 1789; but, in consequence of the failure of many members to attend, no business was done for some weeks. Very shortly after the organization of the two Houses, petitions began to pour in from all quarters, suggesting that our "national independence was but half obtained," whilst we remained dependent on Great Britain for our supplies of the necessaries of life; and praying that Congress would take the proper steps to render the people "independent in fact, as well as in name, by adopting measures for the encouragement and protection of American manufactures." These petitions were referred to the Committee of the Whole of the House of Representatives; and the result of their deliberations was a bill for the imposition of duties on foreign merchandise. This bill was promptly passed through both Houses of Congress, and was approved by President Washington on the 4th day of July, 1789—that day being thus a second time consecrated, by the declaration of commercial independence, as it had previously been by a similar declaration of political independence. The true character and objects of that act will be sufficiently manifest when we advert to its preamble, which recites that "whereas it is necessary for the support of Government, and the encouragement of domestic manufactures, that duties be laid on foreign merchandise," &c. This preamble distinctly connects the subjects of revenue and protection, and shows that, in the judgment of the first Congress, it was competent for the National Legislature to look to protection, as well as to revenue, in a system of imposts. And here let us pause for a moment, to consider how much weight shall be given to the opinion of that Congress? We must recollect that it was composed of the most illustrious sages and patriots of the Revolution! We must remember that probably one-half of its members had been members of the Federal convention which framed the Constitution, or of the State conventions which adopted it! They were fully acquainted with its provisions, and deeply imbued with its spirit! And that body, within a year after the adoption of the Constitution, passed, without even a division, and without the suggestion of a doubt of the constitutional power to do so, a law distinctly recognising the principle of protection; and George Washington, who had presided over the deliberations of the convention, and who was then acting under the solemn sanctions of his presidential oath to support the Constitution, approved it! And yet we are now modestly told that the authors of the Constitution did not understand its meaning, and that the power to protect American labor is an assumption not warranted by its provisions! I must confess, sir, that I hardly know how to meet such an assertion, or where to find terms, consistent with parliamentary decorum, to characterize it.

But let us trace the action of the Government on this subject still further.

On the 8th of January, 1790, President Washington, in his address to Congress, uses this emphatic language:

"The safety and interest of the people require that they should promote such manufactures as tend to render them independent of others for essential, particularly for military, supplies."

On the 15th of January, 1790, Congress responded to this suggestion of the President, by adopting the following resolution:

"Resolved, That it be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury to propose and report to this House a proper plan or plans, conformably to the recommendation of the President in his speech to both Houses of Congress, for the encouragement and promotion of such manufactories as will tend to render the United States independent of other nations for essential, particularly for military, supplies."

In conformity with this resolution, the Secretary of the Treasury (Mr. Hamilton) made his celebrated report in favor of protecting American industry. I should be glad, sir, if this invaluable document was in the hands of every citizen of this Republic. The grounds upon which he rested the policy are very briefly summed up in the following paragraph, which I commend to the consideration of the committee:

"The embarrassments which have obstructed the progress of our external trade have led to serious reflections on the necessity of enlarging the sphere of our domestic commerce. The restrictive regulations which, in foreign markets, abridge the vent for the increasing surplus of our agricultural produce, serve to beget an earnest desire that a more extensive demand for that surplus may be created at home; and the complete success which has rewarded manufacturing enterprise in some valuable branches, conspiring with the promising symptoms which attend some less mature essays in others, justify a hope that the obstacles to the growth of this species of industry are less formidable than they were apprehended to be; and that it may not be difficult to find, in its further extension, a full indemnification for any external disadvantages which are or may be experienced, as well as an accession of resources favorable to national independence and safety."

For some years after this report was made, the American people were subjected to great inconvenience by the refusal of the Governments of Europe to enter into commercial treaties with the United States, founded upon principles of justice and reciprocity. On the 14th of February, 1792, President Washington brought this subject to the attention of Congress, that it might adopt such measures as the interests of the country seemed to require. This communication was referred to a select committee, who made a report, which was submitted to the Secretary of State (Mr. Jefferson) "with instructions to report to Congress the nature and extent of the privileges and restrictions of the commercial intercourse of the United States with foreign nations, and the measures which he should think proper to be adopted for the improvement of the commerce and navigation of the same."

On the 14th December, 1793, Mr. Jefferson made his report, from which I have extracted the following passages, in order that the committee and the country may see what were his views of the constitutional powers and duties of the Government of the United States. [Am. State Papers, vol. 1, p. 300–1.]

"But should any nation, contrary to our wishes, suppose it may better find its advantage by continuing its system of prohibitions, duties, and regulations, it behooves us to protect our citizens, their commerce and navigation, by counter prohibitions, duties, and regulations also. Free commerce and navigation are not to be given in exchange for restrictions and vexations, nor are they likely to produce a relaxation of them.

"The following principles, being founded in reciprocity, appear perfectly just, and to offer no cause of complaint to any nation:

"1. Where a nation imposes high duties on our productions, or prohibits them altogether, it may be proper for us to do the same by theirs; first burdening or excluding those productions which they bring here in competition with our own of the same kind; selecting, next, such manufactures as we take from them in greatest quantity, and which, at the same time, we could the soonest furnish to ourselves, or obtain from other countries; imposing on them duties, lighter at first, but heavier and heavier afterwards, as other channels of supply open. Such duties having the effect of indirect encouragement to domestic manufactures of the same kind, may induce the manufacturer to come himself into these States, where cheaper subsistence, equal laws, and a vent of his wares free of duty, may ensure him the highest profits from his skill and industry. And here it would be in the power of the State Governments to co-operate essentially, by opening the resources of encouragement which are under their control; extending them liberally to artists in those particular branches of manufacture for which their soil, climate, population, and other circumstances, have matured them; and fostering the precious efforts and progress of household manufacture, by some patronage suited to the nature of its objects, guided by the local information they possess, and guarded against abuse by their presence and attentions. The oppressions on our agriculture, in foreign ports, would thus be made the occasion of relieving it from a dependence on the caprices and conduct of others, and of promoting arts, manufactures, and population at home."

On the 4th of January, 1794, Mr. Madison brought forward in Congress his celebrated resolutions, which were known to be the joint production of Mr. Jefferson and himself, and were designed to carry into effect the policy recommended in Mr. Jefferson's report. These resolutions distinctly assumed the power to protect American industry; and, after a long and able debate, they received the sanction of the House. In the course of this debate, Mr. Madison used the following emphatic language in regard to the protection of manufactures:

"The States that are most advanced in population, and ripe for manufactures, ought to have their particular interests attended to in some degree. While these States retained the power of regulating trade, they had the power to protect and cherish such institutions. By adopting the present Constitution, they have thrown the exercise of their power into other hands. They must have done this with the understanding that those interests would not be neglected here."

Without adverting to other recognitions by President Washington of the power and duty of Congress to protect domestic industry, I will add but a single passage from his last address to Congress on 7th December, 1796, in which he says:

"Congress have repeatedly, and not without success, directed their attention to the encouragement of manufactures. The object is of too much importance not to ensure a continuance of their efforts in every way which shall appear eligible."

Passing over the administration of the elder Adams, which is known to have favored the same policy, I beg leave to invite the attention of the committee to some evidences of the opinions of Mr. Jefferson, the apostle of Democracy, and the author of the political doctrines by which the opponents of protection profess to be guided. Hear what the sage of Monticello says, in his second message to Congress on the 15th of December, 1802:

"To cultivate peace, and maintain commerce and navigation in all their lawful enterprises; to foster our fisheries as nurseries of navigation, and for the nurture of man, and protect the manufactures adapted to our circumstances; to preserve the faith of the nation by an exact discharge of its debts and contracts, expend the public money with the same care and economy we would practise with our own, and impose on our citizens no unnecessary burdens; to keep in all things within the pale of our constitutional powers, and cherish the federal union as the only rock of safety:—these, fellow-citizens, are the landmarks by which we are to guide ourselves in all our proceedings. By continuing to make these the rule of our action, we shall endear to our countrymen the true principles of their constitution, and promote a union of sentiment and of action equally auspicious to their happiness and safety."

From this extract, it will be perceived that Mr. Jefferson, in enumerating the "landmarks" by which his administration was to be guided, assigns a most prominent position to the duty of protecting manufactures.

But this is not all. In 1806, the revenue from imposts had increased to such an amount, that Mr. Jefferson had grounds to believe that there would be, "ere long, an accumulation of moneys in the treasury, beyond the instalments of the public debt, which the Government would be permitted by contract to pay." In other words, it was apparent to Mr. Jefferson that there was about to be a surplus in the treasury, above the wants of the Government economically administered. What did he recommend in that contingency? A reduction of duties down to the revenue standard? Let the following extract from his message of the 2d of December, 1806, answer those questions:

"To what other objects shall these surpluses be appropriated, and the whole surplus of the impost after the entire discharge of the public debt? Shall we suppress the impost, and give that advantage to the foreign over domestic manufactures?"

He proceeds to say, that upon some articles the impost might be suppressed; but with regard to the mass of them, he expresses the belief that the "patriotism" of the people would "prefer its continuance and application to the great purposes of public education, roads, rivers, canals, and such other objects of public improvement as it may be thought proper to add to the constitutional enumeration of Federal powers."

Thus it will be perceived that Mr. Jefferson not only recognised the right to protect domestic manufactures incidentally, by just discriminations; but that he contended for the doctrine of protection per se, as a distinct and substantive principle! And to such an extent did he carry his devotion to it, that when the wants of the Government no longer required the money levied by imposts, he was unwilling to reduce the tax, because it would withdraw the necessary protection from American labor; but sought, by an amendment of the constitution, new sources of expenditure, by which the surplus should be absorbed!

But lest it might be supposed that this was a mere temporary policy which Mr. Jefferson proposed to introduce, I will submit one additional passage, extracted from his message of the 8th November, 1808, and then leave it to the disciples of the Jeffersonian school of politics to reconcile their opposition to the system of protection with the solemnly declared opinions of the great author of their political creed! In that message he says:

"The suspension of foreign commerce produced by the injustice of the belligerent powers, and the consequent losses and sacrifices of our citizens, are subjects of just concern. The situation into which we have thus been forced, has impelled us to apply a portion of our industry and capital to internal manufactures and improvements. The extent of this conversion is daily increasing, and little doubt remains that the establishments formed and forming will, under the auspices of cheaper materials and subsistence, the freedom of labor from taxation with us, and of protecting duties and prohibitions, become permanent."

But will it be said that Mr. Jefferson changed his opinions on this subject? Where is the evidence of any such change? I maintain that none can be produced. On the contrary, we have the most conclusive proof, in his letter to Benjamin Austin, in 1816, that his opinions had become more and more confirmed in favor of the doctrines of protection. Mr. Jefferson had, in 1785, in his Notes on Virginia, expressed some opinions adverse to the policy of manufactures in this country. In 1816, when the subject of a protecting tariff was about to come before Congress, his opinions were much relied on by the opponents of that measure; and Mr. Austin addressed a letter to him, informing him of the fact, and asking an expression of his sentiments. The following are extracts from Mr. Jefferson's reply, dated 9th January, 1816:

"You tell me I am quoted by those who wish to continue our dependence on England for manufactures. There was a time when I might have been so quoted with more candor. But within the thirty years which have since elapsed, how are circumstances changed! We were then in peace; our independent place among nations was acknowledged. A commerce which offered the raw material in exchange for the same material after receiving the last touch of industry, was worthy of welcome to all nations. It was expected that those, especially to whom manufacturing industry was important, would cherish the friendship of such customers by every favor, and particularly cultivate their peace by every act of justice and friendship. Under this prospect the question seemed legitimate, whether, with such an immensity of unimproved land, courting the hand of husbandry, the industry of agriculture or that of manufactures would add most to the national wealth. * * * *

"This was the state of things in 1785, when the Notes on Virginia were first published; when the ocean being open to all nations, and their common right in it acknowledged and exercised under regulations sanctioned by the assent and usage of all, it was thought that the doubt might claim some consideration. We have since experienced what we did not then believe—that there exist both profligacy and power enough to exclude us from the field of interchange with other nations; that, to be independent for the comforts of life, we must fabricate them ourse'ves. We must now place the manufacturer by the side of the agriculturist. The former question is suppressed, or rather assumes a new form: the grand inquiry now is, shall we make our own comforts, or go without them, at the will of a foreign nation? He, therefore, who is now against domestic manufacture, must be for reducing us either to a dependence on that foreign nation, or to be clothed in skins, and to live like wild beasts in dens and caverns. I am proud to say I am not one of these. Experience has taught me that manufactures are now as necessary to our independence as to our comfort; and if those who quote me as of a different opinion will keep pace with me in purchasing nothing foreign, where an equivalent of domestic fabric can be obtained, without any regard to difference of price, it will not be our fault if we do not have a supply at home equal to our demand, and wrest that weapon of distress from the hand which has so long wantonly violated it."

Who now will venture to doubt that Mr. Jefferson was an advocate of the doctrine of protection, to the fullest extent?

I have thought it incumbent on me, as a Virginian, to give this full exposition of the true opinions of Mr. Jefferson, because I have reason to know that they have been much misunderstood and misrepresented, even in his own State.

The sentiments of Mr. Madison, the father of the Constitution, and its wisest expounder, have been so frequently expressed in favor of the principle of protection, and are so well known to the country, that I do not think it necessary to furnish any extracts from his messages recommending the subject to the favorable consideration of Congress. In his latter years, when he had retired from the political arena, and was free from all the distracting interests of public life, he had occasion to review the whole subject, and he embodied his matured opinions in two letters, addressed to Mr. Jos. C. Cabell of Virginia—one dated 18th September, 1828, and the other 30th October, 1828—which contained probably the most clear and conclusive argument in favor of the power of Congress over the subject that has ever been submitted to the public.

Mr. Monroe and Mr. Adams adopted, both theoretically and practically, the same construction of the Constitution, and recommended and sanctioned legislative acts to give effect to the principle of protection in the tariffs of 1816, 1824, and 1828. These sentiments, thus avowed and urged upon Congress by all the incumbents of the executive chair, have been promptly responded to, in every case, by the legislative department of the Government; and the judicial sanction has also been afforded, in every form in which the question has been presented to the tribunals of the country for adjudication.

Mr. Calhoun, Mr. Lowndes, General Jackson, Mr. Van Buren, and almost every distinguished politician of every party, have recorded their votes in favor of the principle; and in 1816 it found upon the floor of Congress no champion more able, more ardent, more devoted, than Mr. Calhoun, as will plainly appear from the following extracts from his speech in 1816:

"Neither agriculture, manufactures, nor commerce (said Mr. Calhoun,) taken separately, are the cause of wealth; it flows from them combined, and cannot exist without each. The wealth of any single nation or individual, it is true, may not immediately be derived from the three; but it always pre-supposes the existence of the three sources, though derived immediately from one or two of them only. Taken in its most enlarged sense, without commerce, industry would have no stimulus; without manufactures, it would be without the means of production; and without agriculture, neither of the others could exist; when separated entirely, and permanently, they must perish. War, in this country, produces, to a great extent, that separation; and hence the great embarrassment that follows in its train. The failure of the wealth and resources of the nation necessarily involves the ruin of its finances and its currency. It is admitted, by the most strenuous advocates on the other side, than no country ought to be dependent on another for its means of defence; that, at least, our musket and bayonet, our cannon and ball, ought to be domestic manufacture. But what is more necessary in the defence of a country than its currency and finance? Circumscribed as our country is, can these stand the shock of war? Behold the effect of the late war upon them! When our manufactures are grown to a certain perfection, as they soon will, under the fostering care of Government, we will no longer experience those evils. The farmer will find a ready market for his surplus produce, and, what is of almost equal consequence, a certain and cheap supply of all his wants. His prosperity will diffuse itself to every class of the community."

Having described the effect of war upon our industry and currency, its obstruction to the exportation of our bulky articles, while a demand would continue for foreign articles, to be supplied through the policy of the enemy or unlawful traffic, resulting in a drain of our specie to pay the balance perpetually accumulating against us, he proceeded to say:

"To this distressing state of things there are two remedies, and only two: one in our power immediately, the other requiring much time and exertion; but both constituting, in his opinion, the essential policy of this country. He meant the navy and domestic manufactures. By the former, we could open the way to our markets; by the latter, we bring them from beyond the ocean, and naturalize them in our own soil."

Having spoken of the effect of the war in giving existence to manufactures, and in bringing them them to some degree of maturity, he said:

"But it will no doubt be said, if they are so far established, and if the situation of the country is favorable to their growth, where is the necessity of affording them protection? It is to put them beyond the reach of contingency."

There is but one other authority to which I will refer as sustaining the constitutionality of the protective principle, and I will then pass to the consideration of another branch of the subject. I allude to the message of President Jackson to Congress, on the 7th December, 1830. In that paper the whole argument is condensed into the narrowest possible limits, and presented with a force that cannot be resisted. He says:

"The power to impose duties on imports originally belonged to the several States. The right to adjust these duties, with a view to the encouragement of domestic branches of industry, is so completely incidental to that power, that it is difficult to suppose the existence of the one without the other. The States have delegated their whole authority over imports to the General Government, without limitation or restriction, saving the very inconsiderable reservation relating to their inspection laws. This authority having thus entirely passed from the States, the right to exercise it for the purpose of protection does not exist in them; and, consequently, if it be not possessed by the General Government, it must be extinct. Our political system would thus present the anomaly of a people stripped of the right to foster their own industry, and to counteract the most selfish and destructive policy which might be adopted by foreign nations. This, surely, cannot be the case. This indispensable power, thus surrendered by the States, must be within the scope of the authority on the subject expressly delegated to Congress. In this conclusion I am confirmed, as well by the opinions of Presidents Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe, who have each repeatedly recommended the exercise of this right under the Constitution, as by the uniform practice of Congress, the continued acquiescence of the States, and the general understanding of the people."

With this review of the opinions of the Fathers of the Republic, and of the reasons upon which they are founded, I leave it for the committee and the country to decide whether I am departing from the true principles of the Constitution, in giving my support to a measure intended primarily to raise revenue for the Government, and incidentally to afford protection to American industry.

I will proceed now, Mr. Chairman, to meet some of the more prominent objections to the exercise of the protective power, drawn from considerations of expediency.

Many gentlemen have treated this subject as if it were a mere sectional question—a struggle between the North and the South. For my part, I look upon it in a very different aspect. I regard it as a national question—an American question—one which belongs to the whole country. It is true, that there may be partial and temporary inequalities resulting from the operation of laws like that now before us, as there will be from all human laws. But they will be but temporary in their duration. The country will soon accommodate itself to the new condition of affairs; and the general benefits will greatly outweigh the partial evils. In my opinion, it will be found, if we take a comprehensive and statesmanlike view of our whole Confederacy, that there is, in truth, no necessary conflict of interest between the North and the South, or the East and the West. The very diversities of soil, of climate, of population, and of production, which, at the first view, might be supposed to create antagonist interests, are, when rightly considered, the most fruitful sources of strength, and union, and harmony. Providence seems to have wisely ordained that, as we are separated by the broad Atlantic from the eastern hemisphere, we should have all the elements of national greatness, and wealth, and power, within our own borders. We have a climate and a soil adapted to every constitution, to every production, and to every occupation. We have all the elements of national prosperity, vegetable and mineral, in the greatest abundance; and all that is necessary for their full development, is a liberal and enlightened system of legislation. Who can unroll the map of this great Confederacy, and cast his eye over its extended surface, without feeling emotions of pleasure and of pride, mingled with sentiments of gratitude to the great Disposer of Events, for the magnificent inheritance which he has been pleased to bestow upon us? Let him, then, contemplate, for a moment, the separate and distinctive characteristics impressed upon each geographical division by the hand of the Creator himself, and how will these sentiments be strengthened and invigorated! Then let him reflect upon the mutual relations and dependence of each division upon the other, and of the capacity of each to minister to the wants of the others; and how profoundly must he be penetrated with a sense of the wisdom and the beneficence of Him "whose hands prepared the dry land!"

If we look to the extreme South, we find a broad belt of territory, stretching from the Gulf of Mexico to the Rocky Mountains; which, whilst it yields its rich tributes of sugar and other productions of a tropical climate, to supply the wants of more northern regions, furnishes to them in return a market for their cotton, and breadstuffs, and live stock, and manufactures of every description.

Advancing a step northward, the broad fields of the cotton region are spread before our eyes. Here we see the planter busily employed supplying the wants of the sugar country, and the grain-growing, and grazing, and manufacturing districts, by producing the raw material; which, when worked up into the various fabrics, is to furnish them the means of comfort and luxury. In return, he receives from those districts his sugar, his provisions of all descriptions, and the manufactures which are essential to his enjoyment.

Progressing yet another step towards the north, we behold the unlimited resources of the middle country and great West—the grain-growing and grazing region—whose flocks and herds spread over a thousand hills; and whose fields, surpassing Egypt in fertility, can produce an amount of breadstuffs, and of the other necessaries of life, which knows no limit but the absence of all further demand. But the farmers and the graziers must be furnished with their sugar, their molasses, their cotton, and their manufactures and merchandise; and where can they look so naturally for their supplies as to those parts of the country which consume their wheat and corn, and pork and beef?

When we turn our eyes to the extreme north, we find a country with a less genial climate, and a soil whose comparative sterility discourages the labor of the husbandman. But even this less favored region possesses its peculiar advantages. It is blessed with a population hardy, industrious, intelligent, and adventurous. Its wealth consists in the labor of its citizens; and hence they are found to be devoted to manufactures, to commerce, and to the sea: and, whilst they derive their supplies mainly from the more southern divisions of the Union, they repay them with the products of their manufactories and their fisheries, and by merchandise imported from foreign markets.

These diversities of climate, and soil, and population, necessarily produce diversities of production and occupation among the inhabitants of the various districts. Through them, the Supreme Ruler has ordained that there shall be a natural division of labor. The laws of nature forbid that the great staples of one district should be produced in another. Thus, there is no danger of rivalry springing up between them; on the contrary, the wants of one are supplied out of the abundance of the others. A mutual interchange of superfluities naturally takes place, and thus a commercial intercourse is generated, beneficial to all; and, as if it had been the design of Heaven to facilitate this profitable exchange of commodities, we see the Father of Rivers—commencing his course near the northern boundary of the Union, flowing thence nearly due south, through the heart of all the grand divisions, to the Gulf of Mexico—bisecting this vast continent, and furnishing a channel of commercial intercourse between the various districts unequalled upon the face of the globe in extent and excellence, and binding them all together by ties of interest as broad, as deep, and as strong, as the current with which his mighty volume of waters rolls onward to the ocean!

When we undertake to legislate for a country like this, we should look at it as a whole, and not confine our views to mere local or sectional interests. We should indulge a catholic spirit—a spirit of enlarged patriotism, which can embrace in its grasp the whole Confederacy, from the St. Lawrence to the Sabine. We should look at the great interests of the nation, not as something separate and distinct from each other, but as constituting parts of a grand system, intimately connected together, wisely fitted to each other, and, when properly brought into action, working harmoniously together, and mutually giving and receiving nutriment and support.

When I have suffered myself to be lost in the contemplation of the wide extent of our confederacy, with its members reaching from the Atlantic to the Rocky mountains—with its rivers and lakes, and canals and railroads, and other channels of internal communication, penetrating into every part of it,—I have almost imagined it to be some vast animal organization, whose life blood, supplied by agriculture and manufactures, is thrown out from the great centre of the system in New York, and transmitted through the various arteries of commercial intercourse, diffusing health, and vigor, and vitality to its remotest extremities! Let us, then, hear no more, Mr. Chairman, of local interests upon this subject; let us remember that the prosperity of the nation is made up of the prosperity of its parts. Let us recollect that the cotton-grower is interested in the manufactures of the North, and that the manufacturer of the North is interested in the growth of cotton in the South; and that the prosperity of both is, in turn, intimately connected with the welfare of the grain-growing and sugar districts. For of what use is it to either district to have a large surplus of its products, if the other districts have nothing to give in exchange for it? Of what avail is it to have merchandise, if there is no market for it?

But if gentlemen, discarding these enlarged and American views of the subject, will insist upon treating this question as a sectional one, however unwilling I may be so to regard it, I shall not shrink from the discussion of it in that aspect. I must be pardoned, however, if, before I enter upon the argument, I require that the proper parties to the controversy shall be presented to the country. I cannot consent that this shall be treated as a question between Massachusetts and South Carolina; nor between New England and the extreme South; nor yet between the manufacturers and the cotton-growers. I insist that if there is to be a sectional division, the middle country and the West—the grain-growing and grazing and tobacco districts—shall have their appropriate position assigned to them. I have the honor to represent a district situated in the heart of Virginia, which has a deep interest in this question; and I claim that it shall be heard by its Representative, before judgment is pronounced.

What, then, is the natural position of my district in regard to this question? This inquiry will be best answered by ascertaining the amount and character of its productions; and I have accordingly prepared, from the official returns, the following tabular statement of the principal staples which are cultivated by my constituents:

From this table it clearly appears, that though my constituents cultivate tobacco to some extent, their great staples are wheat, rye, Indian corn, oats, hogs, neat cattle, sheep, horses, and mules. These are the principal articles which they raise for market. They are, therefore, interested in obtaining for these articles the highest possible price. How is this to be effected? It is a well-settled principle, that it is the relation between the supply and the demand which regulates the price of every article. If the demand be large, and the supply small, the price will be high; and, on the other hand, if the demand be small, and the supply large, the price will be low. No one will venture to dispute these propositions. Let us now give them a practical application. My constituents are interested in having the demand for their commodities as great as possible—or, to state the proposition in another form, they are interested in having as many consumers and as few producers of their staples as possible. How is this effected? Obviously, by inducing the people of the North, who are engaged in the same occupation, to turn their attention to other branches of business, such as manufactures, commerce, and navigation; for thereby we not only get rid of their competition as producers, but we gain them as customers, to buy and consume our productions. This simple view of the case shows very clearly where our interest lies.

Now, let us look for a moment at the interest of the cotton-planting States, and see how far it coincides with that of Western Virginia. From the statistical tables furnished to us from the Department of State, I find that my district alone produces considerably more wheat than the whole State of South Carolina, and within a fraction of as much as the four States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Arkansas taken together. The following table shows the whole amount produced in each of those States:

South Carolina	968,000	bushels of wheat.
Alabama	828,052	do
Mississippi	196,626	do
Louisiana	60	do
Arkansas	105,878	do
Whole amount of the four last named	1,130,616

These States, it is apparent, are obliged to buy their supplies of breadstuffs; and we know that they are also dependent on the Western and Middle States for their beef and pork, and horses and mules, and various other articles, which cannot well be raised in the southern country. As the cotton-planter is compelled to purchase these articles, he is of course interested to get them as low as possible. He, therefore, will wish to see as large a supply, and as small a demand for them, as possible—or, in other words, it is his interest to have as many producers and as few consumers as he can. He will naturally wish, therefore, to see the manufactories broken down, and the population of the North devoted to agricultural pursuits, so as to come into competition with us, and bring down the price of the products of our farms. Suppose, for a moment, that the eight hundred thousand people now engaged in the manufactories were suddenly to cease their operations, and to become farmers: what would be the consequence? Would it not cause a complete prostration of the farming interests? The effects on prices would be most disastrous in two ways; for the farmers would have not only to meet the competition of these 800,000 producers, but they would lose them as consumers. But how would this operate on the cotton interest? It would have exactly the opposite effect. It would enable the planter to buy his supplies at the lowest possible rate. Thus, it is apparent that, if we look at this matter as a sectional question, without regard to more expanded and statesmanlike considerations, the interest of the cotton-planter on the one hand, and that of the farmer and grazier on the other, are directly opposed—the one being the seller, and the other the buyer, of particular commodities.

If, then, Mr. Chairman, this subject of the tariff is to be treated as a question between the North and the South, it is plain that the interests of my constituents are much more strongly allied to those of the North than the South. The same remark is applicable, in its fullest extent, to every other district in Western Virginia, and to many, if not to all parts of the eastern division of the State. It will not, therefore, be a matter of surprise to any one, if, in case the question assumes that aspect, I am found co-operating with the Representatives of other grain-growing and grazing districts, in endeavoring to foster the interests of the farmer, by preserving and enlarging the home market.

There are many considerations in support of the principles of this bill, which I had proposed to submit to the committee if I had obtained the floor in an earlier stage of the debate. But, as other gentlemen have anticipated me in regard to them, I shall forbear from repeating them, and proceed to examine some of the arguments which have been urged by gentlemen on the opposite side of the question.

Among other things, we are told that a tariff will tend to raise the price of merchandise, and thereby impose a burden on the farmers and others who consume it. This is, to some extent, true; but do not the farmers receive an equivalent for this burden, in the blessings of a Government which protects them in the full enjoyment of the rights of person and property, and in the increased price of the productions of their labor? What is the proportion between the outlay of the farmer for articles which are subject to duty, and the whole amount of the sales of his crop? Suppose it to be one-half: if he pays ten per cent. additional price for his goods, and receives from the improved home market but five per cent. increase on the price of what he has to sell, is it not plain that he is fully compensated? But this is not the only advantage to the farmer. He is benefited not only in his income, but his capital is also greatly augmented in value. Let me illustrate this idea by an example. A farmer raises on his land 1,000 bushels of wheat, which, in the present condition of the country, is worth 90 cents per bushel, or $900 in the aggregate. Let us then suppose that, by the passage of the tariff bill, and the consequent improvement in the home market, the value of wheat is increased to ten cents per bushel: what are the benefits which will accrue to the farmer? In the first place, he receives the ten cents per bushel, which is equal to an addition of $100 to his income; and, in the next place, the value of his land (which is his capital) is greatly enhanced. The amount of this enhancement may be estimated by treating the $100 as the additional annual profit arising from it; and, as $100 is the amount which a capital of $1,666 66 would yield at six per cent., we will not be far out of the way if we assume that sum to be the measure of the increased value of the land. If the owner wished to sell or to lease it, would he not require a much larger price or rent, if its annual proceeds were worth $1,000, than if they were worth but $900?

But there is another consideration connected with this branch of the subject, which must not be overlooked. The duties on merchandise fall principally on articles which are not indispensable, and are paid by the wealthier classes. The man who wears fine broadcloths, and dresses his wife and daughters in silks and velvets, and walks on rich Turkey or Brussels carpets, and drinks his costly wines, pays hundreds of dollars; whilst the farmer in the country, who owns property of equal value, but does not choose to indulge in such extravagant tastes, pays comparatively nothing. This is a matter which every man can regulate for himself, and if he thinks proper to purchase the articles which are subject to taxation, he incurs the tax voluntarily, and has no one to blame but himself.

But it is said that many of the articles subject to duty are indispensable to the comfort of a family. This is true. But does any gentleman pretend that the Government can be supported without money? We must raise revenue from some quarter; and the true question is, not one of taxation or no taxation, but whether we will have the revenue collected indirectly by duties on foreign goods, or by direct taxes and excises on our lands and workshops!

But let us examine the operation of the duty upon some few articles which are indispensable, and see how wisely the system is adjusted to confer a benefit on the farmer, by way of compensation for the burden which it imposes. The first that I will mention is the duty on foreign wool and woollens. These are indispensable articles, and the tax on them is a burden to the farmer. But does not this tax, at the same time, have the effect of increasing the value of the wool which he shears from his own flocks? and is he not thereby, in many instances, more than compensated? But it is thought to be very hard that iron and salt, which enter into the consumption of the poorer classes, should be subject to duty. Here, again, those who make the objection overlook the fact, that the iron-works and the salt-furnaces bring large sums of money into the country, and supply extensive markets to the farmers, which frequently repay them a hundredfold for the very small increase in the price of their salt and iron.

Let us look at the provisions of the present bill, and see what additional burdens they impose upon a farmer, who annually consumes 100 pounds of iron and six bushels of salt. The duty upon bar iron, prior to the 1st of January last, was $21 per ton, or about ninety-four cents per 100 lbs., and the duty on salt about 4½ cents per bushel. Under the present bill, the duty upon bar-iron is $27 50 per ton, or about $1 22 per 100 lbs., and the duty upon salt is eight cents per bushel; so that, in the worst aspect you can view it, the increased tax which the farmer pays on his 100 lbs. of iron is 28 cents, and on his six bushels of salt 21 cents; making the aggregate of 49 cents per annum! And to compensate for this, he has the advantages of the withdrawal of the labor of thousands of operatives from raising the very articles which come into competition with his own, and of the market which they will furnish for his produce.

But I deny that the proposition is universally true, that the price of articles is necessarily enhanced by laying an increased duty on them. The effect of the increased duty is to enhance the price for a time; but it eventually stimulates our own citizens to engage in the manufacture of the protected articles; and experience, which is better than all reasoning, has shown that, in almost every instance, an increased duty has, in the end, been followed by a diminished price. Let us take, by way of illustration, the articles of coarse cotton cloths and nails, omitting many others which have been already referred to in this debate. About the close of the last war with England, the most indifferent imported cottons were worth from 17 to 20 cents per yard. The tariff of 1816 imposed a heavy protecting duty on them, which has been continued to the present time, and which induced our citizens to enter into the manufacture; and now a better article can be had for from 6 to 8 cents a yard.

But the most conclusive evidence of the fallacy of the notion, that every duty upon an article of importation produces an increase of its price equal to to the addition of the duty, is found in the article of nails. Nails were, until very recently, subject to a duty of five cents per pound; and, of course, if the doctrine which I have stated was correct, we should expect to find the price of nails equal to the cost in the foreign market, the cost of freight and insurance, the profit of the importer, and the amount of the duty; but, to the utter confusion of the supporters of that doctrine, the prices current exhibit the fact, that, while the duty continued, the nails could be bought for 4½ cents per pound—or less than the amount of the duty! The fallacy of the reasoning of those who contend that an additional duty necessarily produces an increased price, consists in an utter disregard of the most important fact, that a protective duty, instead of creating a monopoly in favor of the home manufacturer, tends to destroy the foreign monopoly, by stimulating domestic competition!

But I am admonished by the rapid flight of time not to dwell too long upon this topic. I will take this occasion, however, to state, in a very few words, my idea of the general principles which should govern us in the arrangement of our system of imposts. In my opinion, our duties should be laid with a view to revenue and to incidental protection, but not to prohibition. We should carefully examine into the exact condition and wants of every interest; and we should extend to all, as far as we can, the fostering aid of a parental Government. But we should have no pet interests. Equal protection should be given to all. How is this equality to be attained? Is it by a uniform ad valorem duty in all cases? Certainly not; for that would produce the very inequality which you are seeking to avoid. One manufacture may have arrived at a high degree of perfection, and may be able to enter into competition with the fabrics of other nations, without any aid from legislation; whilst another, being in its infancy, may require the most careful protection. A duty of ten per cent. ad valorem would exclude foreign cottons from your markets, whilst a duty of twenty per cent. would not afford adequate protection to your woollens. It is the province of the statesman to obtain precise information in regard to all these interests, and to adapt his legislation to the varying circumstances and condition of the country. If he should find that Great Britain, by her superior machinery, greater skill, larger capital, and cheaper labor, has an advantage over our manufacturers of 30 per cent. in woollens, of 20 per cent. in iron, and of 10 per cent. in cottons, is it not obvious that a uniform ad valorem duty on these articles would have a most unequal operation?

In such a case, it would seem to me, that equality and justice would require that the protection should be proportioned to the wants of the various branches of manufacture, and that the duties on the articles named should be laid at 30 20, and 10 per cent. respectively, instead of being uniform. Then competition would ensue—the ingenuity of both nations would be taxed to find out new and cheaper modes of manufacture, and, in a few years, the price of the article would be brought down to the lowest point at which it could be afforded.

But suppose that, instead of thus graduating your duties, you were to adopt the principle of my Southern friends, and impose a uniform duty of 20 per cent.: you would exclude the foreign cottons altogether, and thus give the home manufacturer a monopoly. You would place the iron manufacturer upon a fair ground of competition with the foreign producer; and you would afford no protection to the woollen manufacturer, who would be compelled to discontinue the business, and leave it to be monopolized by Great Britain! And thus, instead of destroying one monopoly, you would establish two!

I will now leave this branch of the subject, and proceed to consider the great argument against a tariff, which has been urged through all time, and has been put forth, in every modification, by various gentlemen in this debate. I allude to the allegation, that every duty laid upon an imported article operates as a tax upon the consumer, for the benefit of the domestic manufacturer.

I have already had occasion to show that this proposition rests, to some extent, upon an unsound basis, by exhibiting facts to prove, in the first place, that it is not true, in all cases, that an increased duty causes an increased price; and, secondly, that if it does, such increase is not equal to the enhancement of duty. But there are other views of the subject, to which I invite the attention of the committee. If it be true, that every duty or tax which is imposed upon an article of merchandise, either in its raw state, or in its progress through the various stages of manufacture, or in the form of an impost duty, constitutes an addition to its price, which must be paid by the person who buys and consumes it—does it not follow, by parity of reasoning, that every bounty granted upon an article of merchandise, at any time up to the period of its consumption, must tend to diminish, to that extent, the price to be paid by the consumer? Or, to state the proposition in a more condensed form: if every tax on an article is a burden to the consumer; is not the correlative proposition equally true, that every bounty upon an article is a benefit to the consumer? No gentleman will pretend to deny that the second branch of the proposition is an inevitable deduction from the first: but to what consequences does this lead us? It proves that all the bounties which England gives upon her exported glass, and other articles which are the subjects of bounty under her laws, are not benefits conferred on her glass manufactures, &c., but mere gratuities to the American consumers! It proves, also, that our whole system of drawbacks and fishing bounties is radically wrong, and, instead of benefiting our own citizens, whose interests they were intended to promote, amount in effect to donations to strangers! Yet every intelligent man knows that such results do not ensue; and hence we are authorized to infer that the theory of the gentlemen must be unsound.

But I propose to subject this theory to another simple practical test. Its advocates say that the consumer pays all the taxes imposed upon an article of merchandise, because the tax becomes incorporated into the price of the article, and constitutes part and parcel of it; and, consequently, he who buys the article and consumes it, pays the tax as well as the cost of production, and the other elements which, in the aggregate, make up the price. If this be true, I presume it will be conceded that it is a matter of indifference when the tax is laid, where it is laid, or how it is laid. It may be laid upon the raw material or upon the fabric. It may be laid as an excise duty, or an export duty, in England; or it may be laid as an impost duty in one of our ports; provided the amount is the same, it makes no difference to the consumer; he has to pay it at any rate, and it is a matter of no concern to him who gets the benefit of it. Now, if this proposition be true in regard to goods imported into this country, there can be no good reason why it should not be equally true in regard to articles exported from it. The principle is the same, and the inversion of the course of trade cannot affect it. I then submit it to the advocates of that doctrine to inform this committee what is to prevent this Government, by a very slight change in its fundamental law and commercial policy, from levying all its expenses upon citizens of foreign countries. Suppose that, by an amendment of our Constitution, we should authorize Congress to lay export duties, and that in pursuance of that authority our Government should impose export duties upon those articles which Europe can obtain nowhere else—such as cotton, tobacco, and flour—taking care not to lay them so high as to be prohibitory: according to the doctrine of Southern gentlemen, these duties would all fall upon the consumers of the articles in Europe, and thus we could saddle the expenses of our Government upon foreign nations, and relieve our own people from taxation altogether! The producers of cotton, and tobacco, and flour, surely could not object to such a tax! They would not have a dollar of it to pay; for, according to their own doctrine, it would only tend to enhance the price in the foreign market, and the consumer would have it all to pay! But suppose such a measure were gravely submitted for the consideration of Congress: do you think Southern gentlemen would agree to it? This would bring their faith in their theories to a practical test; and I think I hazard but little in saying they would reject the proposition with scorn. Yes, sir, highly as they prize the blessings of this Union, they would sooner see it sundered forever than submit to such an imposition!

But the distinguished gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. PICKENS] has taken occasion, in the course of his remarks, to repudiate, or rather to qualify, this favorite doctrine of his friends. He now admits that the whole duty is not paid by the consumer, but contends that it is equally divided between the producer and the consumer. Is the proposition true in this modified form? If it is, we have only to adapt our legislation to it; and, by a judicious arrangement of our revenue system, we can collect one-half of the expenses of the Government from foreigners, by export duties, and the other half by imports; and not a dollar need be drawn from the pockets of our own people!

But I cannot leave this point without invoking the attention of those gentlemen who have expressed a preference for a system of direct taxation over the impost system, to the important concession in favor of the latter which is contained in the proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. PICKENS.] Whilst every one must admit that direct taxation falls exclusively on our own citizens, he admits that one-half of all the taxes levied indirectly by a system of imposts is paid by foreigners! When these gentlemen bring forward their project for direct taxation as a substitute for the impost system, the only question, according to the gentleman from South Carolina, for the people to decide, will be—whether they prefer to bear the whole or the half of the taxation necessary for the support of Government!

In my judgment, Mr. Chairman, there can be no fixed rule for estimating the relative proportion of the duty which is paid by the producer and the consumer. It depends upon, and is controlled by, a variety of circumstances which are fluctuating in their character. The relation between the supply and demand exercises a most important influence over it. If there be a small demand and a large supply, the market will be glutted, and the producer must reduce his price, so as to lose the amount of the increased duty. But if the supply be small, and the demand great, then the producer may exact a higher price, so as to cover the increased duty. The truth of these propositions is very clearly illustrated by a reference to our coffee-trade. At the extra session of the present Congress, a bill passed the House of Representatives imposing a duty of two cents per pound upon coffee; and when the news reached Rio Janeiro, the price of coffee immediately declined two cents per pound. The reason of this was, that there was a large supply on hand; and the holders were obliged to take what they could get for it, and submit to the loss of the amount of the anticipated duty. But suppose, on the other hand, there had been a small supply: is it not obvious that the holders of coffee might have exacted two cents in addition to the former price, so as to meet the new duty? It may not be amiss, whilst I am on this point, to advert to another fact connected with the coffee-trade. Some years ago, Congress removed the duty upon coffee altogether; and what was the result? The increased demand thereby created kept up the price to the old standard; and our citizens were deprived of the benefit of the tax, without receiving any equivalent advantage. The withdrawal of this tax was, therefore, a bounty to the producer. If, on the other hand, the tax had been imposed at the extra session, it would have (fallen as the facts which I have mentioned clearly prove) entirely on the producer; for the decline in the foreign value was exactly equal to the anticipated duty; and we should have received the tax, and paid no more for our coffee.

But we are told by the opponents of this bill, that the system of imposts operates unequally, and confers exclusive benefits upon some portions of the Union at the expense of others. This is a grave charge, and one which merits profound investigation; for I hold it to be the duty of the Government to look with an impartial eye to the interests of the whole country. I have, therefore, felt called on to bestow much care in the examination of the practical operation of our whole revenue system, and of our commercial relations, upon all the different sections and interests of the Union. The result of that investigation is a thorough conviction that a variety of circumstances have conspired to give to the cotton-growing States most important advantages over other divisions of the Confederacy. Their representatives are by no means insensible of this fact, as is evident from the tenacity with which they adhere to them. And if we sift the subject to the bottom, it will be found that, whilst South Carolina is so eloquent, through her representatives on this floor, in denouncing exclusive advantages and partial benefits, she is herself in the full fruition of them! and however unconscious her champions may be of the fact, I apprehend that their zeal in opposition to this bill is not a little stimulated by the apprehension that it may have an unfavorable influence on her exclusive privileges, and diminish the peculiar protection which is now afforded to her interests. Strange as the proposition may seem to Southern gentlemen, I maintain that no tariff bill which has ever passed has conferred an amount of protection and of partial benefit on the North, equal to that which, under our present commercial system, is enjoyed by the South; and I will proceed at once to prove it.

In pursuing the investigation of this topic, it is necessary to have a distinct understanding of the meaning which is to be attached to the term protection. I mean by it—not merely the encouragement and aid which any branch of industry receives from our own laws and our own commercial regulations, but also the advantages which it derives from foreign legislation and foreign policy. A benefit may be conferred, or an injury inflicted, upon any of our great interests, just as effectually by an act of the British Parliament, or by an order in council, as by a law of Congress. In order, then, to have a correct idea of the true condition of any of our great interests, we must examine all their relations. We must look abroad, as well as at home; for we would have a very imperfect knowledge of the actual state of affairs, if we confined our views to our own legislation, without regard to that of other nations.

What, then, is the present policy of Great Britain in regard to the various interests of our confederacy, and what are the effects of that policy on them? It requires but a very superficial examination to show that, in regard to most of them, her interests and her policy are directly opposed to ours. The principal interests of Great Britain are her commercial and navigating, manufacturing, agricultural, and colonial interests; and her system of policy is carefully adapted to the promotion and encouragement of all of them, by imposing onerous duties, restrictions, and prohibitions intended to prevent the competition of similar interests of other countries with those of her own subjects. It is not my purpose, Mr. Chairman, to enter into a discussion of the wisdom or justice of that policy. All that I propose is, to examine briefly the effects of it upon the different sections of our confederacy.

Our commercial, navigating, and manufacturing interests belong generally to the North and East; and hence the restrictive measures of Great Britain, which are designed to promote her commercial, navigating, and manufacturing interests, fall principally upon our Northern and Eastern States.

The great agricultural districts of the United States lie in the Middle and Western States, and hence the burdens of the English corn laws, and other measures, intended to sustain her own agriculture, are felt most severely by the people of the Middle and Western States.

The sugar interest of the United States is limited to the single State of Louisiana, and, as a necessary consequence, that State is more injuriously affected than any other by the duties and restrictions which Great Britain has established for the protection of the sugars of her own colonies.

It thus appears plainly, that, in regard to all these branches of our national industry, England has interests which are adverse to ours; and that those interests have induced her to adopt a system of policy which is in a high degree injurious to the prosperity of the United States.

But there is one great staple of our country which, for the present at least, stands in a different relation to the interests of England; and hence we perceive that her policy in regard to it is exactly the reverse of what I have shown it to be in reference to all others. I refer to the article of cotton. That does not come at present into competition with any English interest. Great Britain has not yet perfected the establishment of a cotton interest of her own in India; and she is not ready, therefore, to bring her restrictive system to bear upon ours. It is obvious, however, from all the signs of the times, that this exception from her general policy, which she makes in favor of cotton, will be of short duration; for I perceive from a table which has been published in most of the newspapers, that the amount of East India cotton imported into England in the first sixteen weeks of the year 1841, was but 46,289 bales, and for the corresponding period of the present year the amount was 92,688 bales, being an increase of more than 100 per cent.; whilst the increase upon the importations from America was but 15 per cent. For the present, however, our cotton is essential to the prosperity of her manufactures; and hence she makes a virtue of necessity, and receives it subject to a very small duty.

Having thus taken this review of the British policy, I ask what is the effect of it upon the various interests of our nation? Is it not to oppress the industry of the Northern, Middle, Western, and extreme Southern States, with heavy burdens, and to confer peculiar benefits on the cotton-growing States? Does not the cotton interest, under the existing commercial regulations between this country and England, possess exclusive privileges? Does not the product of that region find a hearty welcome in the British ports, whilst those of every other part of the Union are met with restrictions, exactions, and prohibitions? If this be not an exclusive privilege, will gentlemen tell me what constitutes one? Is it not a preference given to the productions of one part of our country over those of all others? And are we tamely to acquiesce in this policy of a foreign nation? Suppose that such an unjust advantage had been secured to one part of the Union over the others, by a treaty stipulation, or by our own legislation: would the country submit to it? No, sir! A flame of indignation would pervade the nation from one end to the other! The whole land would resound with denunciations of the injustice and iniquity of such partial legislation, and "repeal or revolution" would be the battle-cry of an incensed people!

And yet, because this result is produced by a foreign Government, to promote its own interests, we are told, in effect, that it is our duty to submit to the unequal operation of the laws of England! What, sir, is the argument of the South, to induce the other sections of the Union to bow their necks to be yoke? When stripped of all its specious disguises, it amounts to nothing more nor less that his: "If our Government should impose duties on English merchandise, England will no longer buy our cotton! We must, therefore, insist that the Northern, Middle, and Western States shall give up their manufactures, cease to make their own supplies, and consent to buy them from England, that England may be the more able to give us a good price for our cotton!"

Thus if is attempted to make all the agricultural, manufacturing, commercial, navigating and fishing interests, subservient to the cotton interest!

There is a great principle of national independence which lies behind this question, which it behooves us to consider well before we act. If any foreign nation has a right to make discriminations in favor of the productions of one part of our country, with a view to promote her own domestic interests, may she not make discriminations for the purpose of striking down the interests of another part? and if we are not at liberty to adopt a countervailing system, may she not, thereby, obtain complete control over our domestic policy? If she can discriminate for one purpose, may she not do so for any and all purposes? If she can do so to favor one State, she can do so to injure another. Suppose, then, that England, from motives of resentment towards New York, because of the interference of her citizens in the Canadian disturbances, were to make a discrimination in her commercial policy against the trade from New York: would this nation submit to it? Or suppose that England were to hold this language to Mississippi: "You have repudiated your State debts, and, until you make provision for their payment, we shall levy a discriminating duty on all cotton grown in Mississippi, to raise a fund to pay the interest to your creditors!" Would not every son of that gallant State be ready to shed the last drop of his blood, before he would submit to such an assumption of power by England? Would she not at once invoke the aid of the national arm to redress the injury done to her citizens by such an odious regulation? Yet, I ask gentlemen, if the policy of Great Britain does not now create a discrimination against the products of three-fourths of the States in favor of the other fourth, just as effectually as if her laws had been framed to produce that result? It matters not what the motive may be, the effects are the same; and our duty to guard against those effects is not the less imperative because they may not have proceeded from an unfriendly feeling.

But there is one other form in which I wish to present this subject to my friends from the South. Every gentleman upon this floor has, no doubt, had occasion to advert to the course of the English Government, for many years past, in regard to the subject of slavery and the slave-trade; and there are but few who have not been filled with disgust at the hypocrisy and insincerity by which it has been marked. We all know that England introduced slavery into the United States; and that her refusal to aid in suppressing it was one of the wrongs which impelled this country to a declaration of independence. She wanted the slaves here for the interests of her commerce and manufactures. She wanted them to produce the raw material, and to supply a market for her fabrics. She also encouraged the introduction of slaves into South America, and actually entered into a contract by which she obtained the monopoly of the slave-trade to Brazil. This also was done to promote her commercial interests. Recently, however, she has conceived the idea of building up a cotton interest of her own in India; and hence she is smitten with a sudden feeling of humanity, and a holy horror of the slave-trade; and her cruisers are spread over the African seas, to suppress the cruel traffic in human beings, which for years she had monopolized! The object is plain enough. She no longer has an interest in promoting the growth of cotton in Brazil, and hence she feels no desire to supply the labor that is to produce it. But this is not all. She is looking ultimately to the Indies for her cotton; and when the culture is firmly established there, her policy will then be directed against the cotton of America, which is the product of slave-labor. And I venture to predict, that, the first moment she feels she can do so with safety, she will be seized with another spasm of simulated philanthropy, and exclude from her ports the cotton of the South, on the ground that she cannot, even indirectly, sustain the institution of slavery by dealing in the productions that uphold it! Are Southern gentlemen now prepared to establish a precedent which shall justify such an impertinent interference with their domestic institutions by a foreign nation? Are gentlemen prepared to admit the right of England to prescribe indirectly, as one of the terms of our commercial intercourse, that the Southern slaves shall be liberated? If they are, then are they justified in maintaining the doctrine that we are not at liberty to meet, by counter legislation, the unjust discrimination which the policy of England has made between the different sections of our Union. All the consequences which I have adverted to, plainly follow from the doctrine of acquiescence in foreign legislation. What I desire above all things is to meet these attempts of England at the threshold, and to assert the power of our own Government to regulate our own affairs, and to protect the industry of our own people. I, for one, am for adopting an enlarged system of policy, which shall break down all exclusive privileges, whether secured by our own or foreign laws, and extend to all parts of the country equal protection and encouragement.

I hope now, Mr. Chairman, that we shall hear no more from Southern gentlemen of exclusive privileges, since it is obvious that the whole tendency of their votes here is to sustain the exclusive advantages which they now enjoy under the partial legislation of England!

But, Mr. Chairman, we are to'd by the eloquent gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. PICKENS,] that the system of retaliation and restriction is opposed to the spirit of the age, and unworthy of an enlightened people. He has represented the genius of commerce as a beautiful maiden; freed from all the restraints of an antiquated governess, panting for the largest liberty, and ready to unfold her bright pinions to the winds of heavens, and fly to the uttermost parts of the earth! He has then poured forth torrents of denunciation upon those who would load her graceful limbs with cruel fetters! Sir, I will continue the beautiful simile of the gentleman, and say to him, far be it from my purpose to fasten iron chains upon the fair creature of his fancy! I propose not to enslave her, but merely to impose on her that restraint, and afford to her that protection, which is necessary to save her from the dangers with which her pathway is beset!

We have heard a great deal, Mr. Chairman, in the course of this discussion, about "free trade." Sir, what is it? A mere phantom! an idle dream of visionary theorists! Is it attainable? Is it practicable? Will any other nation adopt it? Has any other nation ever adopted it? No! Why talk about it, then? The doctrine is predicated upon a notion of what men and nations ought to be, instead of what they are! Like the wild conceit of the perfectability of man, it seizes upon the minds of its votaries, and causes them to lose sight of the existing state of things in the contemplation of some dim visions of futurity. Sir, speculative philosophy is one thing—practical legislation is another. We were sent here to legislate for this nation as it is. We must look at the actual state of things at home and abroad. We must look to the vices and follies of mankind, as well as to their virtues; and we must shape our legislation so as to attain, not the greatest possible good, but the greatest practicable good. Have other nations manifested a desire to meet us upon the basis of free trade? Let the table of comparative tariffs on your desk answer the question! What is the aggregate of your importations into this country? and what is the amount of duties which you collect upon them?

The whole importation of 1841 was - $127,945,000
The whole amount of duties, was - 14,487,000
Being at the rate of 11¼ per cent.

What, on the other hand, is the whole amount of your products exported to other countries, and what is the amount of duties which they collect upon them? Upon this point we have not precise information; but I have an estimate which has been prepared with great care by a highly skilful gentleman, who has collected abroad a large body of commercial facts for the Government. I have reason to believe that it is not far from the truth. According to that—

The whole amount of exportations in 1841 was - - - - $91,000,000
The amount of duties levied on them was - - - - - 113,500,000
Being at the rate of 124 per cent.

But let us now come to some of the articles raised in my own district.

The average value of the tobacco exported in 1839 and 1840 was $9,225,145.

Upon this was levied a tax, in Europe, of $32,463,540—being a tax of near 300 per cent. upon the value of the article in this country!

The following table will show, in detail, the amount of the duties, in the principal nations of Europe, on some of the most important articles of exportation from our country, in 1840:

Article.	Great Britain.	France.	Russia.
Flour	$3 12½ per bbl.	$10 83 per 220 pounds.	$3 37 per six bushels.
Wheat	$5 20 per qr., or 95 cts. per bushel.	4 63 per 22 gallons.	Same rate.
Unmanufactured tobacco	72 cts. per lb.	Prohibited on private ac't. Government monopoly.	$7 50 per 36 pounds.
Manufactured tobacco	$2 16 per lb.	do.	$3 75 per 36 pounds.

And yet, in the face of these most ruinous restrictions and exactions, we are invited to throw open our ports to the merchandise of those whose ingenuity is tasked to the utmost to devise new modes of extortion from us.

But we are told that a change is about to take place in the policy of England, and that she will soon adopt the principles of free trade, and it behooves us to meet her in the proper spirit. For my part, sir, before I would be willing to change the policy of this Government to meet the views of England, I would require rather more substantial evidences of her intentions, than mere empty professions. Her system of free trade is well defined in the following extract from the speech of one of her statesmen, Mr. Robertson, in a recent debate in the House of Commons, in which he said:

"It was idle for us to endeavor to persuade other nations to join with us in adopting the principles of what was called free trade. Other nations knew as well as the noble lord opposite, and those who acted with him, that what we meant by free trade was nothing more nor less than, by means of the great advantages we enjoyed, to get a monopoly of their markets for our manufactures, and to prevent them, one and all, from ever becoming manufacturing nations."

That is exactly her policy. She knows she has more capital, better machinery, cheaper labor, greater mechanical skill, and a more extensive marine than any other nation on earth; and that, owing to these circumstances, no other nation can come into fair competition with her; and hence she endeavors to delude them by the senseless cry of free trade.

I have been surprised, Mr. Chairman, that there has been, during the whole course of this debate, an apparent acquiescence upon the part of all who have adverted to the subject, in the idea that, if all nations would adopt the principles of free trade, it would be their true policy. Sir, I deny the doctrine, out and out; and I wish, as far as my feeble blow will avail, to strike the axe directly to the root of the tree. I maintain that what is called free trade—that is, trade unrestrained by commercial regulations, or imposts, or taxes of any kind—would be the most unequal trade that could possibly exist, and would lead to the establishment of the most absolute dominion of some nations, and the most slavish subjection of others. In order to give equal advantages under such a system, you must adopt the principles of national agrarianism—you must make all nations equal in all respects—you must endow them with the same intelligence, the same industry, and the same mechanical skill—you must give them equal capital, equal machinery, equal water-power, and equal amounts of all the elements of national wealth. They must be equally refined and civilized, and have equal facilities for the transportation of their commodities to and from their markets. The slightest disparity in any of these respects, or in geographical position, or in any of a thousand other incidents which might be named, would destroy the balance of the system, and inequality in wealth and power would immediately ensue. How could a nation having no machinery compete with one like Great Britain, whose steam power is probably ten times as great as the combined animal power of her whole population? How could there be equality between an inland nation without a bark to bear her flag, and the "Ocean Queen," whose canvass whitens every sea? How can there ever be fair competition—freedom of trade between power and weakness—between wealth and poverty—between knowledge and ignorance—between industry and idleness? Sir, the notion is preposterous. You had as well oppose the helplessness of childhood to the matured power of manhood, as to place the infant manufactures of the United States in competition with those of England! Adopt the system of free trade, and the dream of Pharoah will be reversed; the fat kine will devour the lean—the more powerful nations will swallow up the trade of the weaker. The people who have the advantages of local position, of industry and intelligence, will soon assert their natural superiority, and become rich and prosperous at the expense of the less favored and the less sagacious. We have, upon our own continent, a specimen of free trade in all its deformities. Between the United States and the Indian tribes, the most perfect freedom of trade exists, unrestrained and untrammeled by any restrictions or duties; and what has been the result? Has there been that mutuality of benefit which the advocates of free trade promise to all who will adopt its principles? Have the Indians grown rich and prosperous under the benign influence of a commerce freed from all the shackles imposed by antiquated and exploded prejudices? or has the whole intercourse between the parties to it been a system of fraud, extortion, and plunder on the one side, and oppression, ruin, and annihilation on the other?

There is yet another example of free trade upon this continent, to which I will barely advert upon this occasion. I refer to the trade between the various States of this Union, which, under the provisions of our Constitution, must, through all time, remain free. Many of the Southern politicians have imagined, from time to time, that the Northern States have, from some cause, obtained an undue advantage over them in the commerce of the country, and they have occasionally held conventions and suggested various restrictive measures, to restore to themselves their due proportion. All these means have failed, and they have persuaded themselves that the injury results, in a great measure, from the restrictions imposed by the General Government on our foreign commerce. Without pretending to solve this important problem, I will take the liberty of suggesting the inquiry whether the effect which they deplore may not flow from a cause very different from the one assigned; and whether, in point of fact, it may not be the perfect freedom of trade between the States of this Union, and not the restrictions upon foreign commerce, which has enabled the North to use her natural advantages in such a way as to gain the ascendency over the South! There is one fact which I will refer to, in this connexion, which may be entitled to consideration. Before the adoption of the Federal Constitution, when each State regulated its own commerce, there was no such concentration of trade at one or two points, as we now find. Even Virginia then carried on a large direct trade; and we are told by tradition, that Yorktown—a village which, but for its proud historic associations with the close of our Revolutionary struggle, would hardly find a place upon the map of the Ancient Dominion—was once the port through which Philadelphia received the larger portion of her supplies of foreign merchandise.

I have now, Mr. Chairman, finished what I proposed to say upon the general merits of the bill. But I cannot take my seat without adding a few words in regard to the deep interest which the State of Virginia has in the success of the measure now under consideration. It is my deliberate conviction, that she will derive more benefit from it than any other State of the Union; for there is no other State which has such a variety of interests to be promoted. Many States possess advantages over her in some respects, but where will you find one which combines so many of the elements of wealth, of greatness, and of power? She is situated in the very heart of the confederacy. She has a seacoast, including the bay, unrivalled in extent; and her western border is, for hundreds of miles, washed by the waters of the Ohio. Her shores are deeply indented with bays, and inlets, and creeks, affording every facility for navigation. The Ohio, the Potomac, the James, and half a score of other navigable rivers, have their sources in her mountains, and, radiating as from a common centre, wind their way for hundreds of miles through her territory, imparting fertility to her soil, and supplying, at the same time, the power to drive the most extensive machinery, and the best possible channel for transporting the manufactured fabrics to market. Her soil is adapted to the growth of almost every vegetable production known to our country. Wheat, rye, Indian corn, oats, tobacco, hemp, flax, potatoes, and every species of grass and fruit known to temperate climates, attain the highest degree of perfection within her borders. Her mineral wealth is no less diversified than abundant. She possesses gold, and silver, and copper, and iron, and lead, and salt, and gypsum, and coal, to an extent that would seem almost incredible to one who had not taken some pains to acquire particular information on the subject.

Her forests abound in the best lumber, and her mountains afford pastures for sheep, which will enable her, almost without an effort, to supplant Vermont in the wool-trade; for whilst, in the frozen regions of the North, the flocks must be fed half the year, in our more genial climate they can generally find the means of subsistence for themselves, in the luxuriant growth of the mountains. In regard to water-power too, she has peculiar advantages, not only in its extent and general diffusion over her territory, but from the fact that machinery is so little liable to be interrupted in the winter by ice. The same remark is applicable to her canals and navigable streams, which are frequently not closed at all during the winter, and never for more than a few weeks. If any gentleman wishes to see a specimen of the natural advantages of Virginia, let him visit her metropolis. Where will he find such a combination of all the natural advantages for a great manufacturing city as Richmond presents? Inexhaustible supplies of coal and iron are found in the immediate neighborhood of the city. The James River Canal, which already penetrates 150 miles into the interior of the country, and is destined at no distant day to form the most convenient line of connexion between the seaboard and the Ohio, affords not only the means of access to the inland markets, but supplies an almost unlimited extent of water-power, to impel the machinery necessary for every species of manufacture. Various lines of railroads, extending in every direction, invite the trader of the surrounding country, by furnishing the most convenient and speedy means of effecting the exchanges of the products of agriculture for the fabrics of the merchant and the manufacturer. Her central position and proximity to the Southern and Southwestern country, where cotton is produced, and a large market for manufactures is found, must give her decided advantages over the manufacturing towns of the North, which are obliged to encounter the expense of the double transportation of the raw material to the North to be manufactured, and of the fabric to the South to be consumed. Her manufacturers will also enjoy another important advantage, from the fact that they will be enabled to throw their fabrics into the market without delay; and thus their capital will always be actively employed, instead of being idle during the long periods of the transit of the raw material from the South to the North, and back again. Give Virginia, then, the benefit of this bill, and you will soon see factories springing up on all her water-courses; you will see her coal-fields explored; her rich mines opened up; her commerce revived; her agriculture invigorated; her capital increased, not merely by the gradual accessions of her own industry, but by the influx from abroad, which her superior natural resources will invite. Give her, I repeat, the benefit of this bill; and you will diffuse prosperity through all her borders; her citizens will no longer be compelled to leave the home of their childhood in search of a precarious subsistence in the Far West; the tide of emigration will cease; and the proud Old Dominion will again, at no distant day, assume her appropriate position in the front rank of the members of our glorious confederacy.

THE END.
